

NANCY WYNNE CHATS ABOUT THINGS WHICH INTEREST SOCIETY

She Soliloquizes About the Many Emotions Awakened in the Country at the Idea of War—And Tells an Anecdote

WELL, I wonder where our cavalry are now? That's the question on every side, and goodness knows it is an interesting one to most of us. But between you and me and the gatepost and a few other things, wherever they are, I only hope they look a bit more as if they had had a bath than they did when I last saw them. And, strange to say, they looked as if they did not mind it a bit, and they were all hot and grubby, too. But why on earth do you suppose they shaved their heads, for a great many did, while "Canary" Potter seemed to have grown a longer and even more shaggy crop of yellow hair and mustache than ever before.

Do you know this war scare will do a great deal for all of us, I think? It will make our men harder and stronger and our women more unselfish and less extravagant. For even though the fighting is averted, the terror of it has been in our hearts, and many things have been revealed which would have lain hidden away, forever perhaps, had not loved ones been separated. Many a woman while appreciating a man's point of view about going thanks God that something has prevented him, while others follow them in spirit from place to place, longing for word that they are safe and well, and will soon come back with wonderful experiences to relate. So many wait to show appreciation of others after they are gone and are not here to hear it. So, bathed or not, they will be welcome back, infantry and cavalry and all alike!

I have a delicious story to tell you, my dears, and it really is not as funny to tell as it was to hear and see. I was riding on a train the other day, in which every chair had been engaged, so four different women were given a seat in a compartment. Three were tall and rather thin, and one was fat and jolly. In fact, I knew two of them, and the fat and jolly one was aged about 40. One of the thinner fry remembered Miss Fatty and said to her: "Isn't this Miss C— (I could not get the name). I met you once in Beach Haven, did I not?" "Oh, yes, I guess so, your face is very familiar." Then they went on to talk of what they had done when at the Haven, and from their conversation one knew that they had been full "growned" when at that resort, though the slender one says she passed for 25 now. Suddenly Miss Fatty said, "That must have been 20 years ago, wasn't it?" It was a scream to see the expression on the other's face!

I wonder why many women hate so to acknowledge their age.

BRITISH TARS FULFILLED ALL TRADITIONS IN JUTLAND FIGHT

Portsmouth, Home of Sea Warriors, Filled With Widows and Orphans of Men Lost in Battle—Survivors' Tales Vivid and Thrilling

By ELLEN ADAIR. Written specially for the Evening Ledger.

PORTSMOUTH, June 21.—The great sea-battle off the coast of Jutland remains an absorbing topic in Portsmouth. For this famous seafaring town is filled with the widows and children of sailors who will return no more and whose bodies strewed the waters of the North Sea till it became indeed "an ocean of the dying and the dead." It is the sailors' home, the breeding-place of England's great sea-fighters.

"There's no town in the world like Portsmouth," said a much-traveled sailor yesterday, "and I've called at nearly every port around the world in my day, so I ought to know."

"You want to hear about the big naval engagement of the other week, off the coast of Jutland?" said he, glancing at his bandaged leg. "I'll tell you all that happened to me. I was an able seaman on the British destroyer 'Fortune.' Her career was short, though lively. We fired one torpedo. Then the German guns put a salvo into us. I was blown right through the boiler room, sky high, then down, down into the sea."

OFFICERS HEROIC

"Don't remember much at that point, except that it was awfully cold. When I came up to the surface I was just in time to see my ship make a sudden terrible dive, stern in the air, straight for the bottom of the sea. Not a trace of her was left, except some of the crew struggling in the water and a raft to which our first officer gradually propelled me. He was badly wounded and quite unable to speak, yet he could swim better than I could and all his thought was to save as many of his men as possible. Our officers are all like that—heroes to the end."

"He helped me to the raft, swam around a bit and brought to us several other wounded men who couldn't swim. We begged him to climb up, too, but he shook his head. He insisted on giving his place to another man. He hung on to the edge of the raft for a little while, and I saw then that he was bleeding badly from the head. After a bit he gave a feeble sort of a smile, let go his hold and sank. He never rose again."

"There were 25 of us on the raft. A German ship came up, turned her lights on us, and we thought she would fire, but she went away without firing or attempting to rescue us. "It was then I noticed for the first time that part of my leg had been shot away. I felt no pain, but was very, very tired. After that, two of the men lying next to me fell asleep. It was death, I suppose, but it looked like sleep. Their heads slipped back, and before I could get at them they had rolled off into the sea. Then the wind got up and a swell came. 'Put!' and our little raft blew gently over and capsized, plunging us all into the water again!"

"Only 11 of us got back to the raft that time. One man lost his balance and fell off—and there were 10 left. Then I heard some one laughing behind me, looked round and saw that another man had gone mad. He was staggering about singing. In a few seconds he was gone. There were only nine left."

"After a while a man started to make an extraordinary speech. I can't remember what it was, but he mumbled nursery rhyme up with it. When he had finished he jumped overboard. There were eight left. "I don't remember much after that until a destroyer came alongside, lowered a boat and pulled us in. Our legs were frozen with the cold. The doctors are going to amputate one of mine in a few days' time. It's that or death, you see."

"Later in the day I talked with a sailor from the British cruiser 'Warrior,' who had escaped by a miracle. 'We came in for a terrific pounding,' he said, 'but stood it well and gave as good as we got. H. M. S. Defense was in advance of us and at first drew all the fire until she blew up and disappeared. Then came our turn. "We were as cool as cucumbers and no ons faltered, though the sea around us was alive with shell and spouting tons of water into the air. The shells were hitting us from stem to stern and the detonations were terrific. Yet we could joke with each other as we rushed to our allotted tasks. I was sent off for respirators and my doctor told me to bring them to the upper deck. When I returned the upper deck was gone—in a sea of flame. My officer was gone, too—killed alive. I rushed to the wireless room. It was gone—blown to atoms."

"Then the lights went out. I ran to the engine rooms to lend a hand. The water poured in on us there, and swirled me in the darkness right among the machinery. It was a horrible sensation—black, cold water, and black, cold steel.

"Rushing to the deck again I saw a sight that made me proud of being an English sailor. Wounded men, dying men, men with arms off, legs off, mangled, were at the guns and working them to the last. "Surrounded though we were by German boats, we of the 'Warrior' were fighting to the death. I saw an officer hit by a shell that struck his legs off, and though he fell to the deck he kept shouting 'Go on, lad, give it them, give it them,' to the moment that he died.

"One of our men went mad with the pain of his wounds and jumped overboard. An officer died after him, and saved him. I was hit by a piece of shell, but it glanced off the lifebelt I was wearing and buried itself in the body of a dead sailor beside me.

"Then the gallant 'Warrior' arrived in the very nick of time, and like a giant scattered the enemy boats to right and left."
