17 SHIPS OF ALLIES TIED UP IN PORT BY SUBMARINE DANGER

Consular Clearing Papers Likely to Be Refused Here Until U-Boat Menace Is Eliminated
R. R. EMBARGO FEARED
Seventeen vessels of the Allies' commercial fleet are tied up in this port as the result of the German submarine operations off the Atlantic coast, and until plans are put into operation by the fleet of Great Britain it is expected that consular clearing papers will be refused all British ships.

Agents for lines under the British flag have announced that sailings for their steamships would be held up until the U-boat raids are stopped or until they are assured that it is safe to send their vessels to sea. It is considered folly to send unarmored ships with a cargo perhaps worth millions into a lurking danger.

The blockade will not last long, however, according to opinion in shipping circles, as it is pointed out that Britain's navy can stop the U-boat operations on this side of the Atlantic almost as well as she has done in English waters. Convoys of war vessels for fleets of unarmed commercial ships will be the natural outcome if further submarine raids continue, shipping masters and sailors say.

Rates on marine and securities insurance have soared in this city as a result of the submarine operations. No specific new rate has been made, it being decided that each company should make the rates as they thought reasonable. As each ship owner comes to them for insurance, they will weigh the risk and offer a figure.

The premium to Liverpool from this port last week was seven-eighths of one per cent. One ship clearing for Liverpool from New York paid five per cent. The rate to Havre has also advanced to the same figure.

The rate on securities last week was one-half of one per cent. Today underwriters were quoting anywhere from two to two and a half per cent, while the rate to London, which last week was from three-tenths to three-eighths of one per cent, is one per cent today.

There was a rumor in shipping circles yesterday that if vessels were not allowed to sail within the next day or two the railroads would declare an embargo against this port to prevent congestion. In fact, the representative of one railroad company told the head of a steamship line that his company was contemplating putting on an embargo. Should submarine operations continue for a week it was estimated that hundreds of men would be thrown out of employment along the waterfront, and it was held possible that the hindrance to commerce might ultimately reach clear back to multitudes far west.

The vessels which have sailed from this port and are now within the U-boat operating radius are:
