CAMERA-SHY DIRECTOR EXHUMED AS AN ACTOR

Universal Digs Up Old Film With Brenon Doing a Dive. The Case of Griffith

By the Photoplay Editor

Usually the actor who has become a director isn't particularly keen on being reminded of his "past." Now, how will Herbert Brenon, producer of "A Daughter of the Gods," feel when he is told that Universal, his old employer, is reissuing a two-reel Imp, in which he not only told the camera man what and when to "shoot," but actually took a part?

Speaking of such things to another director who in "camera-shyness" is David W. Griffith, whom we are remembering with the old Biograph, of course he appeared before the lens often, but after he established himself as a director, he kept out of reach of the watchful eye.

Incidentally, Mr. Brenon has engaged William Hays for a leading role in "The Queen Mother," his next contribution to the Selznick program, starring Florence Reed.

Gladys Brockwell, one of the most versatile young actresses of the time, remembered for her work in Fine Arts and Fox pictures, is again about to demonstrate the truth of Bert Lloyd's aphorism that "the wages of sin is breath."

"Charity," Frank Powell's preachment photo-play production, written by Linda Griffith, and featuring herself and Creighton Hale, will known as a Pathe here, has been taken over by Mutual and will be re-released December 1. A consideration in connection with the picture has been noted, in that its author is the wife of D. W. Griffith, and that the plots of "Charity" and "Intolerance," his spectacular "magical play of the ages," are somewhat similar, though developed quite independently by their respective creators.
