Soulds RESURGENT. By Marion Hamilton Carter. Charles Borbiner's Sons. New York. Fertile % the West has been recently in providing settings for popular fiction, Mar-ion Hamilton Carter in "Souls Resurgent" has touched something entirely new among the diversified elements of ranch life. In-stead of the western man, big. dominant and conquering, there comes a new type-weak, vaciliating and shiftless physically and morally-whose regeneration is accom-pliahed by a girl, of course; but by a girl bred in the East and one whose very bang radiates culture. That the girl is a sister instead of a sweetheart detracts not one whit from the interest. Intensely human and intensely significant of American life, the story lays bare relentiessly the con-flict among its racial and social elements.

. A Strange Creation THE SIX-POINTED CROSS IN THE DUST. By John Boland. Fred A. Stokes Company, New Tork.

By John Boland. Fred A. Stokes Company, New York. An unconventional administrator of jus-tice is "Cigaretta," the hero of John Ro-land's new novel, "The Six-Pointed Cross in the Dust." He is a modern knight errant with decidedly materialistic views on life and its various ramifications. "I am not striving," he says, "as the fashion was in times past, to right men's wrongs, for that is quite impossible; but trying to make the wrongs once done easier to bear; not succoring the innocent, but lending a hand to the guilty. In an age like ours the innocent appear to need no help."

"Deeds that helped." as his companion mays. And so pursuing his chrisous method of alding the guilty, he meets Brother Mel-choir, who had done a grievous wrong, and in one of the most dramatic chapters in the book "Cigaretts" alays him by obliging the mont to drink poisoned wine. True, the sunhappy man had his choice of two vessels, but "Cigarette" had taken of two vessels, but "Cigarette" had taken the precaution to place poison in each con. "When I was arranging the two vessels." Stid "Olgarette." "I suddenly lost my faith in the ways of Providence. I have not always found them either just or reliable, so I divided the twenty tabloide equally between the two cups. * * * As an absolute lord of life and death. I was pleased to grant him his heart's desire."

customarily, writes full-length novels is like-iy to be viewed with suspicion. This sus-picion is not unfounded, either, in these days of rather frequent pot-boilers. Hap-ply it may be said at once that Mrs. Whar-ton's present volume is not only excellent but shows her at her best, which cannot be said of some of her more recent novels. A woman who often chooses queer subjects. Mrs. Wharton had the happy faculty of developing those subjects with exquisite tasts and dramatic strength of an unemo-tional, realistic character. Never has this characteristic been more clearly shown than in the last (and by far the long-est) of the present series of stories. "The Bunner Sisters" ought to excite a great deal of favorable attention. Its true-to-life surroundings, into which are introduced the well-drawn characters of the two sisters. are depleted in masterful siyls. There are true pathos, a sort of homely dignity and faultiens technique in the "Bunner Sisters" --it is by far the most dominant of the stories. "Xingu" is a delightful satiric com-edy, which shows quite another side of Mrs. Wharton's versatility. Few cleverer denunciations of the present-day "feminist" crass have ever been delivered in the guise of a joyous little comedy. "Kerfol" is an-other excellent tale, queer and somber in
