After leaving the young women at their home, the young man instructed the chauffeur to drive him to Fifteenth and Popiar streets. Dr. George S. Bricker, police surgeon at the Nineteenth and Oxford streets station, believes that two men might have been concerned in the crime. This information was laid before Captain Tate, and he ordered that every chauffeur in the city be placed under surveillance in order to learn if any of them have been missing since the gulfs body was discovered.

The doctor bases his belief on the condition of the body and clothing. He said the rooms were not in turnoul, and that reports that signs of a terrific stringle could be found on every hand were false. The apartment, he insisted was altaurhed only as much as would be the case in nearly every home. The conditions he found, the doctor says, indicate that when the healy was carried from the dieling room to the bed, one man held the head while the other carried the feet.
