Dr. G. H. Robinson, head of the servelogical research laboratories, is the discoverer of the methods of measuring the serum's power. He solved the problem that had puzzled bacteriologists for years.

Exhaustive tests, extending over eighteen months, intervened between the discovery of the method of standardization and its announcement. Several thousand white mice were utilized in compiling data on the method, until if gradually emerged from the experimental stage and arrived at a point where it was perfected in so far as human calculations go.

The method, as described by Dr. F. E. Stewart, director of the scientific department, and Dr. A. P. Hitchens, director of the biological laboratories, consists in infecting mice with graded amounts of diplococcus intracellularis, or meningococcus, and testing the counteracting influence of fixed amounts of immune serum. From the regular death rate and rate of recovery encurative power was realized.
