President Expected to Outline Scheme and Decide on Calling Congress

WASHINGTON, March 20. There has been no change in the innational situation since Sunday. This sone of two lone facts that could be arned following a two-hour-andenty-minute session of the Cabinet h President Wilson. The second d was that no additional orders were ed to the Navy Department along d-up or defense plans against Gersubmarine ruthlessness.

WASHINGTON, March 20

The United States today is rushing its guarding the transatlant'e ship ravages of submarine which in the last few days have toll of four unarmed American mialling the loss of American lives. dent Wilson is expected soon to state what is encetmplated, all of which was in the regular Cabinet meeting It is known that the President re-ted in this afternoon's Cab het meeting. None of the members would as the outlook for publication, declarby that the entire situation was too serious. DIVISION IN CABINET

It was understood that there was a dition of opinion on many questions, not wever, so much on the status of affairs " to what action this Government should take under the circumstances. Two members of the Cabinet are known to entertain is view that a state of war between the Unted States and Germany actually exes, and has ever since the sinking of the conia with the loss of two American passengers. Later outrages, in their on, simply have emchasized that fact.

TEUTON LINES HOLD ONRUSH OF ALLIES

Franco-British Push Slows Up as Germans Rush Reenforcements

GIVE UP 200 VILLAGES

LONDON, March 20.

Although the British and French forces in France are still pushing forward, German resistance at some points between Arras and the Aisne River has strengthened. Evidently Field Marshal von Hindenburg has sent re-enforcements into that area in which the Teutons have been carrying out their "strategic retreat."

The Germans have continued to fall back toward Cambrai, St. Quentin, Lafere and Laon desperately pursued by British and French cavalry and infantry. Fighting been in progress over a front nearl 100 miles long.

As the Anglo-French soldiers moved forward in pursuit of their focs they passed through a devastated country which showed all the horrors of war. Railroads and highways were destroyed, bridges were blown up, fields were plowed by fmines and trenches, orchards were uprooted, towns and villages had been blasted to bits by artillery fire or burned and the country was without food. The wretched war refugees were living amid the ruins of what were once their homes or subsisting like wild animals in caves.

About 200 towns, villages and hamlets have been recaptured by the Allies in their forward sweep in Artos, along the Somme front and in the sector between the Somme and Alsne Rivers.

The French are now within five miles of St. Quentin and are reported to be shelling the German military establishments and the railway terminals in the town. French forces have progressed to the east of Ham and Chauny, finding that both of those towns had been pillaged by the Germans before they retired.

Teuton troops had occupied those towns and the others captured in that sector for about two years and a half.

The Germans have been compelled to give up their positions northeast of Soissons, the point on the western front where their lines are nearest to Paris.

Military critics in London and Paris are divided upon the plan of the German general staff. Radicals have expressed the belief that the Teutons intend to fall back to the Franco-Belgian frontier, but only a few hold this extreme opinion.

Many British war experts believe that the retirement of the Germans is approaching its end and that one of the bloodiest engagements of the whole war on the western
