

U. S. ENGINEERS RUN RAILWAYS TO AID FRANCE

Important War Line, "Somewhere," Entirely Under Their Direction

ENTIRE FORCE AMERICAN Though Noncombatants, Work Is Hazardous and Constantly Liable to Air Attacks

By HENRI BAZIN

It is not the faces and forms of these young Americans that are the first thing that strikes the eye. They look for all the world like the soldiers and the sailors that I had already seen operating in those different theaters in France where our men are fighting for the flag. And yet with the difference that there is something different about their equipment—an outfit of twisted iron, steel plates, and other material that is not seen in any other theater of war.

They had not been in the line for long when they were ordered to move. They were to go to a new station in the north of France where they were to be put in charge of the railway line. It was a hazardous and constantly liable to air attacks.
