AMERICAN MARINES TOGETHER AT LAST

Whole Brigade of Sea Soldiers Inhabit Spotless Town in France

Former Newspaper Man Tells How Epistles From American Girls Were Received

By HENRI BAZIN

Staff Correspondent Evening Public Ledger with the American Army in France

WITH THE AMERICAN ARMY IN THE FIELD, Jan. 3.—For the first time since American soldiers arrived in France, the best of them, in my humble opinion, the marines, are brigaded together as a unit under their own brigadier general. They form part of a certain divisions from this 3d day of January.

As is known, a certain percentage of marines received their first training with the first division to arrive in France last June, although they were not a part of it, since in the regimental sense that division was complete. Something over a battalion remained intact and together; the remainder of their regiment and another were scattered on provost duty throughout France, at ports of entry, upon lines of communication, and, in the case of one company, sent to a town in England where they performed, as did their sea brothers in France, highly praiseworthy duty. Now, with the exception of a couple of companies still retained on provost duty, they are all together in and about Spotless Town, as I have called the little village where the undivided among them have been quartered for some time.

The entire brigade was recruited at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and a little less than 50 per cent of the rank and file are either Philadelphia born or first saw the light in the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware. I have made a practice of gathering in a memorandum book a list of the Philadelphia-born marines, and it covers numerous pages.

EX-COPY READER WRITES

Here's a little culled from the diary of a Philadelphia marine, an ex-newspaper man, who left a copy desk in a spirit of patriotism to become a private in the corps. He can't get by with his copy himself; but I can for him through editing it a bit, so that names, etc., which might give the Boche a lot of "dope" are sternly and rigorously eliminated. Rather good sport, believe me, censoring some one else's "stuff"!

"Today great joy reigns and intense excitement permeates the ranks of the supply company, —— Regiment, Marines. Old D—— C——, the hard-shelling mule skinner from Texas, carries a smile on his moonlike countenance that seems likely to linger till the cows come home. He has received a letter from HER, and that's the answer. It's a boy, she says, born not a hundred miles from Broad and Dickinson, Philadelphia.

"Our Robert, the 'Anvil Chorus' singing blacksmith, who was born in Philadelphia, but not in the Fifth Ward, hypnotizes high kickin', balky, litin' Jacks into docility with snatches of song. His beautiful tenor voice waxes tender as he drives nail after nail into the hoofs of Mister Mule.

"Recently the company office, of which I happen to be a part, received a number of posters, addressed to Sammee soldiers and sailors in France. As the marine is both, he got a whole bunch. The posters pictured a chic-looking girl placing a letter in a really, truly U. S. A. painted green letter box, and emblazoned in gilt letters across the top of the sheet ran the words, 'What she wrote.' The poster went on to say that the bureau would be glad to furnish the names of fighters to ladies anxious to do their bit.

"Accordingly, I stuck up the poster on the company bulletin board and all over the age-worn walls of our billet, and also posted a n tice offering to send in the names of lonely men to the bureau.

APPLICANTS A-PLENTY

"When the boys busted in from the job and glimpsed the posters I became the target for machine-gun questions. In no time I collected a formidable-looking list, which I duly forwarded to the philanthropic bureau.

"The letters were duly inspected and debated upon, finally passed by the censor and mailed. Then came the period of suspense, weeks of hiking and training, etc. Finally, with the arrival of a certain post from home, the curtain rose on the second act. Four heart balms were distributed, but the recipients refused to a man to open before their comrades. Rumor flew thick and fast at 'chow.' By next morning the Dame gave way to Truth.

"Old D—— C—— received an 'Oh, such a pretty!' note of four-scented pages filled with hero-worshiping stuff, the kind Douglas Fairbanks and Francis X. Bushman employ secretaries to read. The writer was a maiden of 'steen years with the imagination of a dramatist. Old C—— admitted he was old enough to be her daddy, which, I guess, is right, as he has only been twenty-four years in the corps. The maiden wanted his photograph and she hoped he was brave and handsome and would tell how many Germans he killed and wouldn't he send her a souvenir, a lock of his hair, even a lock of the Kaiser's would do at a pinch. And then she concluded:

"'Are you really lonely? Do you like fudge? I make the most beautiful fudge. Are you a blonde or a brunette? I prefer blondes, and I hope you are one.' Well if the Texas cow-kicker sends that maiden a photo, he'd better keep his helmet on or borrow a wig.

ROBERT AND THE STENOGRAPHER

"Our Robert, the Philadelphia blacksmith, is the victim of an apparently athletic stenographer. He told me her name, but I can't pronounce it, let alone spell it. She says she has a dog named Robert, too, but she'd rather have a man, a real Bob. Her favorite sports are swimming and knitting sweaters for soldiers. Her chum is the most beautiful girl in the old home town.

"Patty ——— says his is typewritten, and he flashed the envelope to prove it. She is ravenously beautiful because she says so herself, and she prays Patty is lovely to look upon. On the other hand, the only French child in Surgeon ———'s dispensary was scared blue when she first saw Patty. Patty's maiden bemoans the fact that all the brave boys have been called to the colors, and she is so shy on escorts that she has entered her name at the Old Soldiers' Home, for she won't have anything to do with a slacker.

"Since those few letters all hands are in the mad rush at the shout of 'Mail O!' but as a disappointed marine said when he drew blank in the last post, 'There ain't nothin' in it nohow.'"

NURSE DIES IN FRANCE

Media Woman, Base Hospital Member, Pneumonia Victim

Word has been received by the family of Miss Alice Ireland, of Media, a nurse with the Episcopal Base Hospital in France, of her death from pneumonia. She was thirty years old and had been with the hospital unit in France for five months.

A sister, Miss Elisabeth Ireland, also a nurse, is now in New York awaiting to sail for France. Three other brothers survive her.

"DRIVE ON!" he said angrily, and the coachman touched his whip to the horses. But they only reared, to be grasped at the bridles by hostile hands ahead.

Karl half rose from his seat.

"Sit still, Majesty," said the Chancellor. "It is the students. They will talk, that is all."

But it came perilously near to being a riot. Led by some students, pushed by others, the crowd surrounded the two carriages, first muttering, then yelling. A stone was hurled, and struck one of the horses. Another dented the body of the carriage itself. A man with a handkerchief tied over the lower half of his face mounted the shoulders of two companions and harangued the crowd. They wanted no friendship with Karnia. There were those who would sell them out to their neighbor and enemy. Were they to lose their national existence? He exhorted them madly through the handkerchief. Others, further back, also raised above the mob, shrieked treason, and called the citizens to arm against this thing. A babel of noise, of swinging back and forth, of mounted police pushing through to surround the carriage, of cries and the dominating voices of the student-demagogues. Then at last a semblance of order, low muttering, an escort of police with drawn revolvers around the carriage, and it moved ahead.

But Karl only raised his eyebrows.

In his rooms, removing the dust of his journey, broken by the automobile trip across the mountains where the two railroads would some day meet, Karl reflected on the situation. His amour-propre was hurt. Things should have been better managed, for one thing. It was inexcusable that he had been subjected to such a demonstration. But, aside from the injury to his pride, was a deeper question. If this was the temper of the people now, what would it be when they found their suspicions justified? Had Olga Loschek been right after all, and not merely jealous? And if she were, was the game worth the candle?

But when he arrived for tea in the Archduchess's white drawing room he was urbane and smiling. Hedwig, standing with cold hands and terrified eyes by the tea table, disliked both his urbanity and his smile. He kissed the hand of the Archduchess and bent over Hedwig's with a flash of white teeth.

Then he saw Olga Loschek, and his smile stiffened. The Countess came forward, curtsied, and as he extended his hand to her, touched it lightly with her lips. They were quite cold. For just an instant their eyes met.

It was on the surface an amiable and quiet tea party. Hilda, in a new frock, flirted openly with the King, and read his fortune in tea leaves. Hedwig had taken up her position by a window and was conspicuously silent. Behind her were the soft ring of silver against china, the Countess's gay tones, Karl's suave ones, assuming gravity as he inquired for His Majesty; the Archduchess Antrinclata pretending a solicitude she did not feel. And all forced, all artificial, Olga Loschek's heart burning in her, and Karl watching Hedwig with open admiration and some anxiety.

"Grandmother," Hedwig whispered from her window to the austere old bronze figure in the Place, "was it like this with you, at first? Did you shiver when he touched your hand? And doesn't it matter, after a year?"

"Very feeble," said the Archduchess's voice, behind her, "but so brave—a lesson to us all."

"He has had a long and conspicuous career," Karl observed. "It is sad, but we must all come to it. I hope he will be able to see me."

"Hedwig!" said her mother sharply, "your tea is getting cold."

Hedwig turned toward the room. Listlessness gave her an added dignity, a new charm. Karl's eyes flamed as he watched her. He was a connoisseur in women; he had known many who were perhaps more regularly beautiful, but none, he felt, so lovely. Her freshness and youth made Olga, beautifully dressed, superbly easy, look sophisticated and a trifle hard. Even her coldness appealed to him. He had a feeling that the coldness was only a young girl's armor, that under it was a deeply passionate woman. The thought of seeing her come to deep vibrant life in his arms thrilled him.

When he carried her tea to her, he bent over her. "Please!" he said. "Try to like me. I——"

"I'm sorry." Hedwig said quickly. "Mother has forgotten the lemon."

Karl smiled and, shrugging his shoulders, fetched the lemon. "Right, now" he inquired. "And aren't we going to have a talk together?"

"If you ask it, I dare say we shall," Hilda, frowning into her tea-cup. "if see a marriage for you."

She ignored her mother's snub, and lifted her cup to examine it.

"A marriage!" Karl joined her, and peered with mock anxiety at the tea-grounds. "Strange that my fate should be confined in so small a compass! A happy marriage! Which am I?"

"The long yellow leaf. Yes, it looks happy. But you may be rather shocked when I tell you."

"Shocked?"

"I think," said Hilda, grinning, "that you are going to marry me."

"Delightful!"

"And we are going to have——"

"Hilda!" cried the Archduchess fretfully. "Do stop that nonsense and let us talk. I was trying to recall, this morning," she said to Karl, "when you last visited us."

She knew it quite well, but she preferred having Karl think she had forgotten.

"Yes," said Karl gravely, "just before Hubert——"

"Yes," said Karl gravely, "just before——"

"Otto was a baby then."

"A very small child. I remember that I was afraid to handle him."

"He is a curious boy, old beyond his years. Rather a little pig, I think. He has an English governess, and she has made him quite a little woman."

Karl laughed, but Hedwig flushed.

"He is not that sort at all," she declared shortly. "He is lonely—and rather pathetic. The truth is that no one really cares for him, except——"

"Except Captain Larisch," said the Archduchess smoothly. "You and he, Hedwig, have done your best by him, surely."

The bit of bygone was not lost on Karl—the sudden stiffening of Hedwig's back, Olga's narrowed eyes. Olga had been right, then. Trust her for knowing facts when they were disagreeable. His eyes became set and watchful, hard, too, had any noticed. There were ways to deal with such a situation, of course. They were giving him this girl to secure their own safety, and she knew it. Had he not been so mad about her he might have pitied her, but he felt so pity, only a deep and resentful determination to get rid of Nikky, and then to warm her by his own fire. He might have to break her first. After that manner had many queens of Karnia come to the throne. He smiled behind his small mustache.

When tea was almost over, the Crown Prince was announced. He came in rather nervously, with his hands thrust in his trousers pockets. He was very shiny with soap and water and his hair was still damp from parting. In his tailless back jacket, his long gray trousers and his round Eton collar he looked like a very anxious little schoolboy, and not royal at all.

THE WORLD'S WAR
Through Woman's Eyes

By ELLEN ADAIR

Woman in War

LONDON, Jan. 23.

"WOMEN," said a noted general recently, "have truly surprised the world in this terrible war, and they are of all nationalities."

Certainly, if bravery and devotion to their country are the tests for the award of the cross of courage, many women would have received it.

Think of such heroines as that little seventeen-year-old French girl—a modern Joan of Arc—who, in addition to tending the British wounded, fought side by side with the soldiers in an hour of crisis and was seen to kill five Germans with a revolver and with grenades. Her valor inspired the men and led them on to victory. Her name is Emilienne Moreau, and she has been awarded the Croix de Guerre.

There are the heroic women, too, of shell-swept Flanders, who lived constantly under fire in the Belgian lines in the famous cellar house of Pervyse—the Baroness de T'Serclaes and Miss Mairi Chisholm. Always in danger, with the German shells continuously raining around them, they kept the men in the trenches supplied with hot cocoa and soup and saved hundreds of wounded men's lives by their first-aid.

There's famous Sergeant Flora Sands, also, who fought with the Serbian army and who showed amazing resource and bravery in helping the Serbs to clear out an enemy trench—in which action she was badly wounded by a Bulgarian hand-bomb.

And now I come to one of the most heroic women of the great war—one who laid her life down gladly for others—who was buried with the highest military honors and around whose grave congregated all the great ones of this world. I write of that intrepid woman doctor from Edinburgh, Scotland—the head of the Scottish Women's Hospitals for Foreign Service—Dr. Elsie Inglis, who shared in all the horrors and hardships of the Rumanian and Serbian campaigns, who refused to leave the sick and dying in Krushevatz under German onslaught, whose hospital was bombarded night and day for three days by the oncoming Germans and Austrians, who was taken prisoner by the enemy, who never once lost spirit and who, though broken in health, headed another hospital unit into Russia and stuck to her post there till her work was finished—when she died.

"She has all the great qualities of both sexes, and none of the small ones," was often said of her. I have known her personally all my life, and have never met a finer woman. When I attended her burial service in London and, looking around, saw ambassadors from every part of the world come there to do her homage, statesmen, princes, royalty—those whom the world calls great—it seemed to me that a new era for womanhood had been brought about by the great war.

The patriotism and courage of the martyred Edith Cavell need no detailing. They are known already. And there are lots of women, too, like Mrs. Harley, sister of Lord French, who met a heroine's death at Monastir when in charge of a motor-ambulance unit.

The women who stay at home may be doing work as noble, though perhaps not so spectacular. Certainly this war has brought certain women to the front—types that hitherto have been quite unnoticed.

For instance, there's that new personage in the feminine world—the woman who can work with women! She is a complete revelation to men, and to most women. Women have always preferred to work with men because they found their own sex to be too petty and jealous. A type of woman has arisen during this war who is a born leader—and popular! Other women will do anything for her. She adds understanding to the qualities possessed by men leaders.

The Scottish woman-doctor to whom I have previously referred was such an one. "We would do anything for her" the girl doctors who worked under her at the front often assured me.

Another new war type is the middle-aged woman, who has come into her own at last! No one thought she was any good for employment before the war. She rather agreed with them herself, too—which was a distinct pity!

Then patriotism fired her blood and she started to persuade people that common sense and experience do count.

It took some doing—particularly in conservative Great Britain!—but no war agency now dares to fix an age limit for its workers. It is open to be persuaded that middle age is not a handicap. The middle-aged woman used to dye her hair when first she faced the employment agencies, but she has given that up now. Gray heads have won a place for themselves in munitions, in the "Wanes" (Women's Auxiliary Army Corps), in the Women's Land Army and in Government offices.

A much-criticized being—in pre-war times—was that bugbear, the mother-in-law! Now she is immensely popular!

And why?

Before the war, few people found out her use. But when the trumpet of Mars sounded, and homes had to be broken up, she held out her arms to wives and children. Everything else has changed but her home. So whenever there is a change elsewhere, or a 'leave,' she is the refuge. Children have been left with her while the wife flew to her husband in hospital, furniture has been expanded like elastic, and all at a moment's notice. That is why she is popular. She knows how to rise to an emergency.

Another type of war woman who has sprung into being is the domesticated woman! Her talent was buried before the war—particularly in Great Britain, that home of the "cheap servant." The domesticated woman felt the attraction of the kitchen—but dared not go into it! The cook barred the way—and her own colossal ignorance made her afraid. She did not know she had a great talent for domestic economy until the war came.

Then it became patriotic and the fashion to cook and scheme. Besides, the cook left. Like hundreds and thousands of other naturally domesticated woman, the "mistress" has come into her own during the war, and it is a kingdom of pots and pans. She has discovered a new world in domesticity, and it is full of interest.

Daughters will in the future be brought up to enjoy the game, too, and it is safe to say that no domestic talent will be hidden in a napkin in future—to please the cook.
