

PROTECTOR YOUTHS
NAVY YARD CARS AGAIN VIRTUALLY COLLAPSED

Charged With Beating Watchman to Death in Attempted Escape
Delayed Workers Pronounced P. R. T. Service Inadequate as Ever Before This Winter

NORRISTOWN, Pa., Feb. 11.—In attempting to escape from the Philadelphia Protector at Fatland early on yesterday, three boys, it is charged, killed Patrick McGorry, the watchman, who is sixty years old. The boys were afterwards captured in the clothesroom of the institution, where they had hidden, and were brought to Magistrate Clark to await the result of the coroner's inquest. The boys are Daniel Donohue, fifteen years old, of Philadelphia; William and Fred Stanton, who are sixteen years old, and who reside with his uncle, Harry Sexton, in Philadelphia. McGorry, who was the son of Thomas Kelly, also of Philadelphia.

The boys were inmates of the protector. They were paroled several months ago and had been only a few weeks away, they say, when they stole an automobile near Norristown and robbed several places in Phoenixville. The police also allege they broke into a store and stole $20 worth of clothing. Leaving the institution with the car and a few minutes before the automobile was arrested and returned to Fatland.

The three boys did not like the confinement and had planned to escape from the institution on Thursday night, according to a confession which the police say they made after they were under arrest. It was arranged that night that Kelly, who is the manager, was to give the boys go from his dormitory to another room and when the watchman went to learn what kept him so long the other boys were to jump on him and take his keys. This plan failed when Kelly overheard the boys and was called to the door by a boy, who was in the room with him. Kelly then went to the door and when he was met by the other boys, who were waiting in the hallway, he was pushed out of his pocket and beat in the face. The boys then ran and hid in the room of the watchman and then stole the keys of the institution from him.

Before they could get away Brother O'Connell, who had been awakened by the noise, went to the door. McGorry lay on the floor, where a few minutes afterward a physician from Port Kennedy, who was hastily sent for, pronounced him dead. The boys tried to get out of the institution, but they were found by the police and taken to the watchman's room, where they were hiding when the Norristown police found them.

The boys did not know McGorry was dead until they were arraigned for a hearing, when they were told that they were charged with the murder of the watchman. They were held in custody and seemed indifferent. Detective Corrigan said that Donohue and Sexton had bloody hands when arrested.

"Germany Must Be Beaten," Pennsylvanians Surprised at Progress Made by New Jersey Experts
Whether the Philadelphia approach to the proposed Delaware River bridge shall be from Front street or Delaware avenue, or both, was the question discussed today by engineers acting for the Joint Pennsylvania and New Jersey bridge commissions. The meeting, held in Mayor Smith's office, was attended by bridge experts of both States.

J. A. L. Waddell, the engineering expert of the New Jersey commission, explained in detail his spiral approach plan to be located on the river from between Arch and Race streets, and exhibited a model showing the method of transferring trolley and wagon traffic to Front street without further congestion of Delaware avenue. Objections to that portion of the plan calling for the landing of trolleys by John W. Wilson, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, formerly of Philadelphia, who has just returned to America after a tour of the French and Italian fronts and a visit to the leader of the American forces in France.

Doctor Wilson delivered his message to the congregation at the First Baptist Church, Eighty-sixth street and Park avenue, New York, yesterday. With the assurance from General Pershing that Germany would go down to defeat, he held the trolley and wagon traffic to be to be encountered before the war is won.

"But the war," he said, "is not to be won in any easy fashion. If we have had such thoughts, let us get rid of them now and look at the matter soberly. From demoralized Italy struggling and holding bravely out, Great Britain sending her sons by millions to the firing line, if Germany is to be defeated, America must put her shoulders under the burden as she has not done up to this time—nor here and there or in part, for there must be a great compact of patriotism and love for humanity to stand as she has not stood for this great cause."
