WILL IRWIN DESCRIBES ITALY'S RECOVERY

Correspondent Tells How Army's Morale Was Nearly But Not Quite Destroyed by German Cunning

Picturesque incidents of warfare were flung off like sparks from an anvil this afternoon by Will Iricin, war correspondent, before an audience of the Red Cross Auxiliary, 608 Chestnut street. How the Italian morale was close to broken down for all time by the sheer for support for the Federal suffrage deviltry of German cunning in forging amendment when it comes up in the newspapers and circulating false reports Senate. The replies were from: of peace conferences and treaties ending the war; how the whole right wing of an Italian army was lost in a tangle of mountains and a city-full of little children and women in evening gowns were struck down by the roadside—all this he recounted with a lightness of touch that could not discuss the counter of the counter this he recounted with a lightness of touch that could not disguise the dramatic quality of his narrative.

"And it was no cowardice on the part of the Italians, but the damnable cunning of the Germans that caused the Italian retreat at Caparetto," Mr. Irwin, insisted. "Every one in Italy had been firmly convinced by German propaganda that the war would be over last December.

'What's the use of fighting if the war's all fixed up?' was the question we heard on every side. Oh, they're damnably cunning, clever, these Germans, but one thing they had forgotten about italy, that she's 69 per cent pride, "Mr. Irwin declared. "They dealt her an unearthly wallop in her pride and she came hack. Yes, thank God, she found herself in time to save her national pride."

With a vibrant note of pride he told the story of how the Italian troops met the Germans on the banks of the Plave and drove them back.

"Such a victory on the side of the Germans." he said, "would have been advertised throughout the nations." Mr. Irwin drove home the contrast with a punch. "The Germans know the art of self-advertising. The French and Italian don't."

Where Is the Cheapest Section of Philadelphia?

Residents of Germantown claim that it costs less to live in West Philadelphia, while West Philadelphians are of the opinion that the center of the city is the cheapest. Every district figures that it must cost less somewhere else.

But there is ONE section where food and rent are more reasonable than elsewhere.

Where this is—and why—is told in the second of three articles dealing with the cost of living in Philadelphia today and prepared at the request of the Government, which will appear in the
