GERMANS A WEEK REWINNING RIDGE LOST IN SINGLE DAY

It took Von Hindenburg a whole week, marked by incessant assaults nd predigious sacrifice of men, to capture Messines Bidge.

The British, on June 7, 1917, took it in a one day's buttle. In two great blows they smashed the German line south of Ypres, cleared the ridge of the foe and flattened out the dangerous salient that had pointed toward Calais since October, 1814. Pushing from the north and south they forced the retirement of the enemy from a position that was four miles deep.

Over a million pounds of high explosives, the greatest mining operation of the war, tossed the German trenches into the air, and before the Teuton line could be reformed the British tanks were plowing through the remnants of the defenses and the triumphant Tommies were beginning

London, April 17.

The Pall Mail Gazette printed prominently last night a report of the situation in Flanders which obviously is worthy of attention. Under the headline, "Today's Battle Situation—Necessity of a Long View—Ypres Salient—Further Retirement May Be Involved," appears the following from "a well-informed correspondent" in the center of the front page:

"The great battle fluctuates. To-day's communique from Field Marshal Haig can convey only one meaning, that the German high command seemthat the German high command seemingly is prepared to pay for every yard of ground they gain in rivers of blood,
for to them human life has no value
beside the urgency of the need to buoy
the spirits of the German people with stories of gains at whatever cost.

"The country may be compelled to take a longer view of the great struggie within the next few days if it is to maintain the splendid confidence that has been displayed in much darker hours.
