MARRIAGE MUST NOT BE THE JUMPING-OFF PLACE

Life Held Nothing for Matilda but Spending the Evening With Her Husband-How She Learned to Bring Him Back When He Went A-Sliding

MATILDA asked nothing more in of an invitation. But I was writing my first club paper. His surprise turned to a cuse of pique. But I was very joily about it all, and said the paper must be finished, as the club or just at home sitting beside the home trying to understand the lus and home trying to understand the lus and the program, and I couldn't disappoint them. And then it happened for haps it the pieces of her heart and went downtown the morning after the third evening, in sheer desperation.

It was among the summer voite on the second floor that Matilda met Mrs. K. Busy, busy Mrs. K., who was slways on her way to some committee meeting. Matilda never particularly liked her. It was all very well to work for better loides and improvement of industrial conditions among working girls, but to Matilda it suvered to make. Shades of neglected homes!

Matilda had never liked her, but you.

And it was because things were just like this that Matildu's heart broke one night. Yes, it did break. For the third time that week Henry has decided to go out—by himself. You can imagine how Matildu felt. There was nothing she hadn't done to keep Henry's love. Never had he seen her in a red flainful wrapper. FOR CHILDREN

A Child's Food

First. The difference between the di-gostive powers of a little child and an adult is almost as great as between the digestive powers of a cow and a canary hird. The haby is less fitted to eat the same food that his parents can than be at the ways their shows or is do their id to wear fleir shoes or to do their muscular work. To say of a me or two year old child that "He cats everything that his father doon" is a confession of distorted ambition and eciminal ignorarea that will undoubtedly some day be made a penal offense in this country, as it has long been in France.
