REATING a powerful air-fleet has been one of the Nation's most urgent taskssecond only to the building of ships-to which the country is addressing itself with all its energy.

There must be scouting planes without number to seek-out enemy batteries and radio their position to the American sure'shots. There must be great fleets of combat planes-light and speedy-to give chase to reconnoitering German machines.

There must be ponderous bombing planes to soar over enemy munition-plants, submarinebases and railroad centers, hurling tons of high explosives down upon them, that "kultur" may not be forced upon an unwilling world.

Already, American airmen have distinguished themselves overseas. And Atlantic Gasoline is propelling many of these Allied planes-Atlantic that always "fires" in all temperatures; Atlantic, that is dependable under all stresses.
