ESPERATE HUN ATTEMPT TO INVADE CANADA THWARTED IN THE NICK OF TIME BY QUICK WORK OF "EAGLE'S EYE"

Dixie Mason, a Girl Employed by the United States Secret Service, Works Her Way Into the Confidence of German Leaders and Tips Off Government Agents to What Is Going On

The power house are the power house and huy me the spread in the doorway wining her hands on her spread in the doorwa ARRISON GRANT carried home with him that night the vision of a second through by electric current, hanging empty by switch in the power house. A poterial of emotions seethed through his id. A feeling of distaste that one was, in all cutward appearances, so are and true, so refined, should lend cleverness to the furtherance of the composition of the window while von Papen and Von the window while vo and true as she was beautiful, that he wanted her so because—he had ed for her. But any such feeling was impossible now. She had proved it apparent friendliness with the German element was born of copartnership their crimes; her interest in Von Lerts had come through the fact that too, was a coworker in Imperial emany's great game of murder, a cootter in the destruction of American dustries, American peace of mind, American lives! He could see no alternative but that he should blot out this her that had grown in spite of ad once more register a report him, and once more register a report against her.

Early the next morning he made his report at the chief's office.
"We will investigate the charge," he was assured. "You need concern yourself no further with it." The similarity of the announcement to those following his other reports of Dixie Mason jarred strangely on Grant. He could not fathom the mystery of events unless—a subtle hope suddenly sprang into existence. Could it be possible that there was some good reason for her activities other than interest in the Germans? Might it be that the main office was holding information from him that would explain it all. Grant pursued this line of reasoning because it held out a hope for him and removed the cause of his distrust for Dixie Mason. But once more it brought him up against a blank wall of useless confectures.

If Dixe Mason had been of the Secret him up against a blank wall of useless conjectures.

If Dixie Mason had been of the Secret Service she would have told him so in the powerhouse instead of allowing him to think her a German spy, arrest her and then put her to the trouble and danger of freeing herself by such precarious means. If the arrest had gone through and she had been a member of the service she would have had to tell everything about herself later, so why not in the beginning? More than that, what possible reason could there be for her to conceal her affiliation with the service—

The were in it?

conceal her affiliation with the service—

All of which goes to prove how futile as the attempt of one mind to reason as mother would. For there had been several reasons why Dixie Mason concealed ser connection with the Secret Service. The first and biggest was her order from the chief that she work herself into the confidence of those highest in Germany's my system in the United States, and hat she tell no one of her connection with the Secret Service. Another very good reason for her not revealing her must as also stood at the switchboard littening to Grant accusation that she had been instrumental in causing the destruction of the A. T. R. Munition Works. If it had been so simple a thing for Grant to believe, why could also not convince Von Lertz and his German friends that she had done this thing which would mean so much to them and to lay the foundation for a confidence which would be not convince the robatin their secrets by established right? It was a good idea.

"Tan you come to my apartment, soon? At once if possible. It is very important. And please bring a sharp flie with you—yes rather large. I'll explain. Thank you. Good-by." She hung up the receiver with a triumphant smile. The smile lingered as she deliberated on the avents of the evening. She was very lired, but she must bring this latest affair to a successful close. The opportunity was too great to pass by.

She heard shortly the sound of Von Lertz's car drawn up to the curb and a few moments later the bell of the apartment rang. She ran to open it herself, and, as Von Lertz entered, she held up laughingly a little hand about whose wrist dangled one manacle of a pair of handcuffa.

been conscious of the open desk near the window, littered with papers. Now as she stood at the window ostensibly for the purpose of gazing curiously over the teal buildings, she glanced at a letter, evidently tossed aside hastily.

"Your Excellency," the letter ran in German, "Dr. Albert and myself today took up your suggestion of an invasion of Canada with Count von Bernstorff. While he believes that the enterprise would be an exceedingly dangerous one and that we should use every precaution to prevent the Secret Service from charging us with any part in it should it fail, there is reason to believe that such an enterprise would meet with a great measure of success.

"I reported to him that our plan included the raiding of all important points of Canada possessing military stores, such as Windsor, Montreal, Winnipeg, Regina, Port Hope and other centers, the demorralization of which would mean great delay in the sending overseas of large expeditionary forces on the part of Great Britain.

"B. asked what had been done and told him that arms already had been stored in six sections, assembling at Silver Creek, Mich., there to seize the Welland Canal; Wind Mill Point, Mich; Wilson, N. "In this connection, might I suggest to you that this be done at once, as more than 100,000 reservists throughout the United States will throughout the United States will shortly receive their orders to move toward the border in as inconspicuous a manner as possible, and that everything should be awaiting them when they arrive. Otherwise, we fall. Doctor Albert and myself will attend to the shipment of arms by the usual method.

Efficiency again — efficiency in the shape of another written report from one office to another, in the stolid, plod-fing desire of Imperial Germany to see that every step of its murderoup progress was arranged for and made clear to those in whose hands the trend of events iay.

This time it had made clear one of its plots to Dixie Mason of the Secret Service!

Across the top of the letter, in Von Papen's scrawling hand, had been written:

She handed Mamette the list and

She handed Mamette the list and some money. Mamette seized them and hurried out. Dixle turned again to her desk and scrawled a letter which, two hours later, was delivered to Harrison Grant at the Criminology Club by special delivery. It added another lot to the mystffication which had been lending zest to his life the last few days. The letter read: "Have notified the chief of German

"Have notified the chief of German concentration camps along the border preparatory to invasion of Canada. Hold yourself in readiness for a big raid on German headquarters at Exeter. Will keep you informed under name of Randolph Bruce.

"Operative 324."

Grant turned to his card index of Secret Service operatives and hurrically skimmed through the file.

"Operative 324." He slipped out the card and stared at it in irritation. The card and stared at it in irritation. The card hore no name, no address, no photograph, no thumbprints, no identification, simply the legend:

"Operative 324—Name and identification withheld for good of service."

Grant frowned, and then sphilosophically slipped the card back into its place and stepped toward the pushbutten to summon his operatives.

"So they are undertakers now. Queer business to be in." He stepped into the station and peered through the bare of the ticket window at the station agent who sat in the inner office, chair tilted back against the wall, an odoriferous corncob pipe ciutched between toothless gums.

The station agent brought his chair to a level and slowly rose and slouched to the window. Following which effort was a long argument during which the dirty-faced boy finally convinced the station agent that he needed an assistant, had always needed one, and that he was the assistant needed. After due attention had been called to the ancient dirt; covered floor, the dust of station benches and the litter of bygone lunches, the job was landed, and an hour later found the station undergoing a long-needed cleaning at the hands of the new assistant. The dirty-faced boy had found stippoyment, food, shelter—and the opportunity of acquiring the contents of every telegram entering or leaving the station. And as the dirty-faced boy was Ifxic Misson, the information was priceless to her—and the interests she served.

"O. K. Ex." She waited tensely for the answer.

Suddenly a shadow fell across the doorway and Dixie started violently.

"Here, you! What're you doing at that telegraph instrument?" The rough voice of the station agent sent a chill of fear through her. "You don't know nothing about them things. Get out of here!"

He pushed her roughly aside and seated himself at the table to take the message that in spite of nervousness and sudden fright seemed to burn itself into her brain. It was for Heinric von Lertz!

Time was too short for the Secret Service to catch up all the tangled threads of this plot. While the waiting automobiles whirled Grant's men to the camp in the gorge, the station master was telephoning frantically to Vo Lertz. And a short half hour later their big automobile was grinding its way southward, carrying Madame Stephan and her partner in intrigue away from the scene of the flasco.

Up on the Canadian border, mounted troops, summoned from twenty barracks by the Chief and Grant, rushed to protect the passes, tunnels and bridges, and throw a line of soldiery along the frontier.
