DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS IN REPORTER ROLE

And Movie Star in "Say. Young Fellow" Has Lively Adventures

When Joseph Henaberry, one of the est-known directors in motion pictures, directed Douglas Fairbanks's success "The Man From Painted Post" last year, he evinced talents of a high order. Some time ago he wrote a story the originality of which attracted Mr. Fairbanks and work upon its production was begun without delay. This was "Say, Young Fellow," which will be shown at the Stanley Theatre next week. The scenes of "Say, Young Fellow," are laid in a small inland city which has its newspapers, all looking for "scoops." On one of these papers is employed a "young fellow" who is widely known for his smilling optimism which defies dis-couragement. When he succeeds against almost insuperable odds in getting an interview from a crusty old millionaire who loathes the press and its represent-"the young fellow's" nounts high.

He is then sent to a neighboring town GAIL KANE HAS HER to dig up the facts regarding an alleged fraudulent scheme in connection with the operation of a big factory, and it is in the performance of his duties as in the performance of his duties as press "Sherlock" that he meets with the adventures which form the basis of this duced by her own company. This an-ing Marjorie Daw, who is seen as "the girl": Frank Campeau, Edythe Chapman and James Nell, "a kindly bachelor." The scenario is by Hugh Mc-clung.

MARINE OFFICERS IN "THE UNBELIEVER"

In the great patriotic war picture "The Unbeliever," based upon the story "The Three Things," by Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews, in which the U.S. marine corps contributed striking military "atmosphere," several officers cooperated with the producers.

Major Ross E. Rowell appears in charge of the artillery operations, Major Thomas Holcomb commands the marine infantry, and orders them "over the top." Captain Thomas G. Sterrett is seen in command of a dugout, and calls for six volunteers to go on sapping duty and report on enemy mining activities. Lieutenant James F. Rorke plays the part of Lieutenant O'Shaunnessy, who dies on the battlefield. "The Unbeliever" will be the attraction at the Forrest will be the attraction at the Forres
