CLEMENCEAU BRAVES SHELLS AT DORMANS

French Premier Notes That Prince Eitel Fritz Stole Nothing but Clocks

By WALTER DURANTY Special Cable to Evening Public Ledger Copyright, 1918, by New York Times Co.

Your correspondent saw Premier Clemenceau at Dormans Sunday. Despite the fact that shells were falling on the town from time to time the Premier visited the main street.

Subsequently he examined the chateau on the outskirts belonging to Senator Talle, whom Clemenceau often visited before the war.

Clemenceau wore a dark sack suit and a slouch hat, in striking contrast to the uniforms and helmets around him.

HARDEN UPHOLDS WILSON'S SPEECH

German Editor Combats Hertling's "War for Destruction" Idea

Special Cable to Evening Public Ledger Copyright, 1918, by New York Times Co. The Hague, July 30.

Maximilian Harden decries the current number of the Zukunft in the text of President Wilson's speech.

"Chancellor von Hertling stated on July 11 in the Reichstag that President Wilson wanted war to destruction," says Harden.

"Where is then in Wilson's speech the most sign of a will to destruction?" asks the President of America.

"In six speeches, which have been published in the Zukunft, Wilson has spoken of the German Government with bitterness, without ambiguity, and with the greatest consideration for the German people.

"People to be Protected" Harden argues that, although one part of the speech may appear to mean another a blunt refusal, whoever accepts a will to destruction therein has no hope.

All United Against Bolshevism Harden asserts that the Socialists of the world, with few exceptions, approve Wilson's aims.

GERMAN 1914 LEADERS ARE CALLED TRAITORS

Army Captain, Who Won Iron Cross, Demands Their "Ruthless Prosecution" by Reichstag—Guilty of Forgery

Special Cable to Evening Public Ledger Copyright, 1918, by New York Times Co. Amsterdam, July 30 (Special Dispatch to the London Daily Express).

Captain von Beerfeldt, who was recently prosecuted for spreading the Lichnowsky memoirs in Germany, but who for mysterious reason has been set free, has sent a remarkable petition to the Reichstag.

"The Reichstag must decide that Germany's leaders in 1914 must be ruthlessly prosecuted," he declares.

"Should the Reichstag refuse to take all this into consideration, I would then ask for my family's passports to Switzerland, because free men can no longer live in the German fatherland.

Australians Carry Two Trenches in Raid Advance 500 Yards on 4000-Yard Front, Taking Prisoners and Guns

By H. W. NEVINSON Special Cable to Evening Public Ledger Copyright, 1918, by New York Times Co. London, July 30.

Australians made an early morning assault upon the enemy lines astride the Bray-to-Corbelle road on the tongue of land between the Ancre and the Somme.

The attack was carried out half an hour after midnight and two lines of trenches were captured between the villages of Morlaingourt and Sully-Laurette on a frontage of 4000 yards to a depth of some 500 yards.

The captures reported numbered two officers and ninety men and five machine guns.

GRAND GERMAN PLAN RUINED BY GEN. FOCH

Campaign Which Began With Hindenburg's Strategic 1916 Retirement and Came Near Victory Has Been Brought to Naught

Special Cable to Evening Public Ledger Copyright, 1918, by New York Times Co. Paris, July 30.

The more the German armies' retreat and all its attendant circumstances are studied here the more apparent becomes to French opinion the extent of the disaster which has befallen the German armies.

These plans were laid on a colossal scale and can only be appreciated if we detach ourselves for the moment from the immediate events and look at the last year of war more or less from a philosophical point of view.

The German plans, which have just been shattered, undoubtedly began to be put into operation with Hindenburg's great strategic retreat of two years ago.

But the Germans, ever better than we, realized that in a straight fight on that front, as things then were, there was every possibility of a crushing British victory.

Such a qualification rather falls to the ground in the face of the fact of a confirmed German retreat, but the paper goes on to say the enemy still further tribute by saying that "never before has the strategy of the western Powers been so untried and untried as during the last few weeks."

With the two eliminated, Germany would be free to throw all her forces on the western front, first against France and then against the British.

Hindenburg's retreat two years ago, which puzzled many people and led to so much controversy, had all these factors for a foundation.

"Just as we have," he says, "weakened the enemy by our offensive action up to the present, so it will now be our task to do that by means of defensive."

On that point the war correspondent of the Times, who has pointed out the sources of man-power at the disposal of the western Powers, says: "It is false to talk of any effective weakening of the fighting power of the French army."

All that can seriously be pleasant reading for the fatherland, so thoroughly schooled of late in the belief that Foch was the master of war as compared with Hindenburg and Ludendorff; that the German commanders had the initiative firmly in their grasp, and that the Entente resources had been completely exhausted at the various offensives since March.

tory appeared in sight. The object of the fifth consecutive offensive was to drive back Gouraud's army in the Champagne and capture Chalons and smash through Berthelot to the east of Rheims and seize Epernay, thus bringing about the fall of Rheims and cutting off Verdun and the armies of the east from Paris.

The next step was to have been to swing around on Paris from the south of Rheims and secure the capital by a general converging advance through the valleys of the Seine, the Marne and the Oise. How bitter must be the disappointment of Germany is indicated by an article in the Vorwaerts on July 15, the first day of the offensive, which stated that the general opinion in Germany was that the campaign of the present summer would be a pleasant parade on an enormous scale, which would result in the final crushing of the enemy.

There remained the French and the British. The German drive from St. Quentin against the British on March 21, we can now see clearly, was only preparatory to what the enemy hoped would be a final blow at the French. It proved sufficiently successful to render the British incapable for the moment of a real offensive action and left the enemy more or less a free hand as the German command assumed to deal with the French.

The German offensive in April (which was a mere diversion only), in May, June and July, followed. The three last named were directed solely against the French, and should, according to the information in the possession of the German general staff, have proved entirely successful. The German intelligence service was convinced that the French had only a broken army, that their reserves had been used up and that neither the French nor the British were in a position to react effectively.

It is the custom among the Allies to regard the German intelligence service as super efficient and our own as mediocre in character. For the time being silence is imposed, but future years may show to what extent the German defeat we are now witnessing has been due to the obscure and thankless, but devoted, tireless and magnificent work of the British and French intelligence departments.

Led Germans to Blunder After the splendidly successful manner in which the Allied intelligence and counter-espionage men led the great German general staff into its fatal blunder on July 15, let us have no more disparagement of this little understood but too often abused service.

The enemy's grossly faulty intelligence service and Foch's ability to take swift advantage of it brought to nothing the German plans at the very moment victory appeared in sight.
