I could not listen. It was not charm I wanted, now, but sympathy, help. Suddenly I felt very much alone. If there were only some one understanding. I would run over to Eleanor's. She would know what to do.

When I had reached the quiet street and had pulled the old-fashioned bell. I felt comforted already. Eleanor would know the best way out. Eleanor would know the best way out. Eleanor would know the best way out. Eleanor would advise me.

Mrs. Angus is not in, answered the sharp-faced woman at the door. I was going down the steps.

I had to decide it now—and alone. I towed Eddle Smith something. I had taken his money and given him my promise to make good. If I returned checkbook and a few weeks' experience. Did the aunts need me? I could scarcely say 'yes.' With my dreams, I had always been a thorn in help flesh. I had not go make good and the material salways been salways the cheapest to buy. For if women would always buy the money that must be paid or expendence the money find must be paid or expendence to make good. If I returned help the following the same that the smartest things are in any art.

It was decided, then—I would not go back.

The weight of indecision rolled away. I felt free, able to accomplish; I should succeed.

THE WOMAN'S EXCHANGE

Dear Madame—Will you kindly put in your paper what will make the skin tan instead of red on a boy with a fair skin? X. Y. Z. If your skin naturally reddens in the sun instead of tanning there is no reliable method of making it tan. Cold cream will remove the burn and color of suchurn and a liquid lotion will take away the burn and not the color. Vinegar applied to the face is said to turn red to tan, but this remedy is not always infallible. If you can stay out in the wind and run long enough the burn should tan of its own accord, even on a fair skin; but it takes several months of continued exposure to the weather for a naturally red sunburn to turn tan.
