Last Word in Veils and Collars A Daily Fashion Talk by Florence Rose

Perhaps they seem a bit exaggerated, but have you ever seen any veil as becoming? The collar and cuffs described in today's fashion talk are of organdie edged with bias folds on which are embroidered dots EILS never were so much worn as ever, there have been many improvised VEILS never were so much worn as they have been this summer. That seems like a very bold and broad statement, nevertheless, it is an actual fact. It is not the small face veil that proved so popular, but the veffs on the order of what is usually designated as a motor veil. It is by no means necessary to be the possessor of a motorcar or even have the good fortune to have a lien on a sent in some one clase's automobile to wear one of these veils, for the necestrians seem to be the ones who are most partial to this type of veil.

Most of the veils worn are on the order of the barem veil—a fashion which was started two years ago at Newport, and it has taken two years for that veil to strike popular fancy.

There are many different styles of this veil, but one of the best, almost most expensive, is the large mesh veil, either plain or with hand-run scroll design, with a half-yard width of chiffon hemetitched to the net. The chiffon usually borders the net on three sides, the entire length of the veil being from two to two and a half yards. The most popular colors are navy and white, champagne.

THE season of the shirtwaist man is I upon us, and it is difficult for the most fastidious of us to look with disapproval upon the man of the house who approval upon the man of the house who defiantly removes his coat. But, of course, he should pay even more careful attention to his "underneaths." and so a good-looking belt buckle is very much in order right now. With their customary foreknowledge of the needs of our men, the shops are setting forth in attractive displays some exceptionally fine-looking silver belt buckles. Some are perfectly plain, just awaiting "his" monogram, and others have a bit of engrav-You can purchase your favorite

It is surprising what a tassel will do by way of giving just the right finishing touch to a belt or girdle, particularly on a satin or taffeta dress. And when they can be secured so reasonably, and such attractive ones at that, there is little excuse for omitting the little extra touch that would be the making of a dress. Good thick tassels are those I saw, in gray or yellow, or a bright orange, or in fact in almost any color, and their price is only fifteen cents each.

that I thought was particularly pretty, and I wrote about it, but today I saw one that makes me wish I hadn't written about the other, so that I can use all those words, and more, too, to describe today's find. In the first place, it is sterling silver, no larger than a twenty-five-cent piece and hardly as thick. It is of engine-turned finish, which means that the surface is striped with fine lines, with an oval or square space left for an initial. It is not rounded, how-ever, but is six or eight sided, and inside pletures can be placed. It is a most delightful little trinket for chain or rib-bon, would make a charming gift, and can be had for $2.50.

You can place them securely in you knitting bag, and the first thing you know those points will be peeping out, even at the expense of poking holes right through the bag. friend and I had an argument and we de-cided to write to you and ask you and the girls and boys who read your column to give heir opinions. My girl friend has been going around with a man everyone says is very good looking. Some have said he is the handsomest man they have ever seen. And ow since he has gone to camp and has on a uniform he looks better than ever. Now, the point is this: While this girl friend that I peak of is not homely, she is still nowhere near as good-looking a girl as he is a man.

He has always been very nice to her and has asked her to marry him, but she thinks if she would marry a man so much better looking than she is she would be unbappy, as after a while he would set tred of her. The reason we were arguing is because there is another fellow just ordinary in looks but a sure he will enjoy a house party. if she would marry a man so much better looking than she is she would be unbappy, as after a while he would set tired of her. The reason we were arguing is because there is another fellow just ordinary in looks but a very good fellow who would pay attention to her if she would encourage him. I told her to stick to the one every one says is so bandsome, because he has never been conceited or in the least way thought he was better than any one else on account of his looks. What do you say and your readers? TWENTY-ONE.

TWENTY-ONE.

I think on this occasion the opinions of the boy and girl readers will be more interesting than mine. Personally, I think actual pretty features do not matter out way or another in a girl's looks. A girl can always be nice looking if she is careful about her appearance and arranges her hair becomingly. Many happy marriages have resulted between exceptional-looking men and very plain women. If a "handsome" man is susceptible to the fattention of women and is filtratious he can make his wife very unhappy. But if he is a real man underneath the good looks he won't care a snap about other girls. I don't think your young friend has sufficient grounds for giving up the friend in camp. The big thing is, is she really in love with him? Perhaps some

Dear Cynthia-The other evening a girl A Sailor and a House Party

Dear Cynibla—Would it be correct to invite a young man to a house party? I have an invitation to go to a house party and i have to own up that it is the first I have ever gone to. I have been saked to bring a partner, as the other girls all will have boys there that they know very well. The house party is at the home of a girl friend of mine and her parents will be there. Do you think it would be all right to ask a sallor who has called on me three times? I don't know many boys. WORRIED.

he believed I hated him and only kept company with him for pastime." This was a week ago and I have not heard or seen him since. I love him very much, so I wish you would please tell me what to do. C. A.

The boy no doubt was only trying to tease you by pulling your hair and your collars. It was natural of you to refuse to let him walk with you if he would not stop teasing. And there was no reason for him to take the scolding as an indication of your not liking him. Do you mind my saying that I think it is very foolish for you to go around with a boy whom you have never had to your home? If it is your fault that the boy has never come to your home I would arrange to have another girl and boy there some night and then drop him a little note asking him to come, too. You might say that you are sorry he took offense at your remarks the other evening, but that there was nothing to do but get cross with him when he wouldn't stop teasing you. Then when you see him, good-naturedly refuse to let him tease you are more.
