

PHILADELPHIA'S QUEST FOR LABOR DAY ENTERTAINMENT SEEMS NOT TO HAVE BEEN A VAIN ONE

WHEN SEPTEMBER COMES and the longing of the outdoor lover becomes overpowering, away he goes a-camping in his canoe and under the turquoise skies.

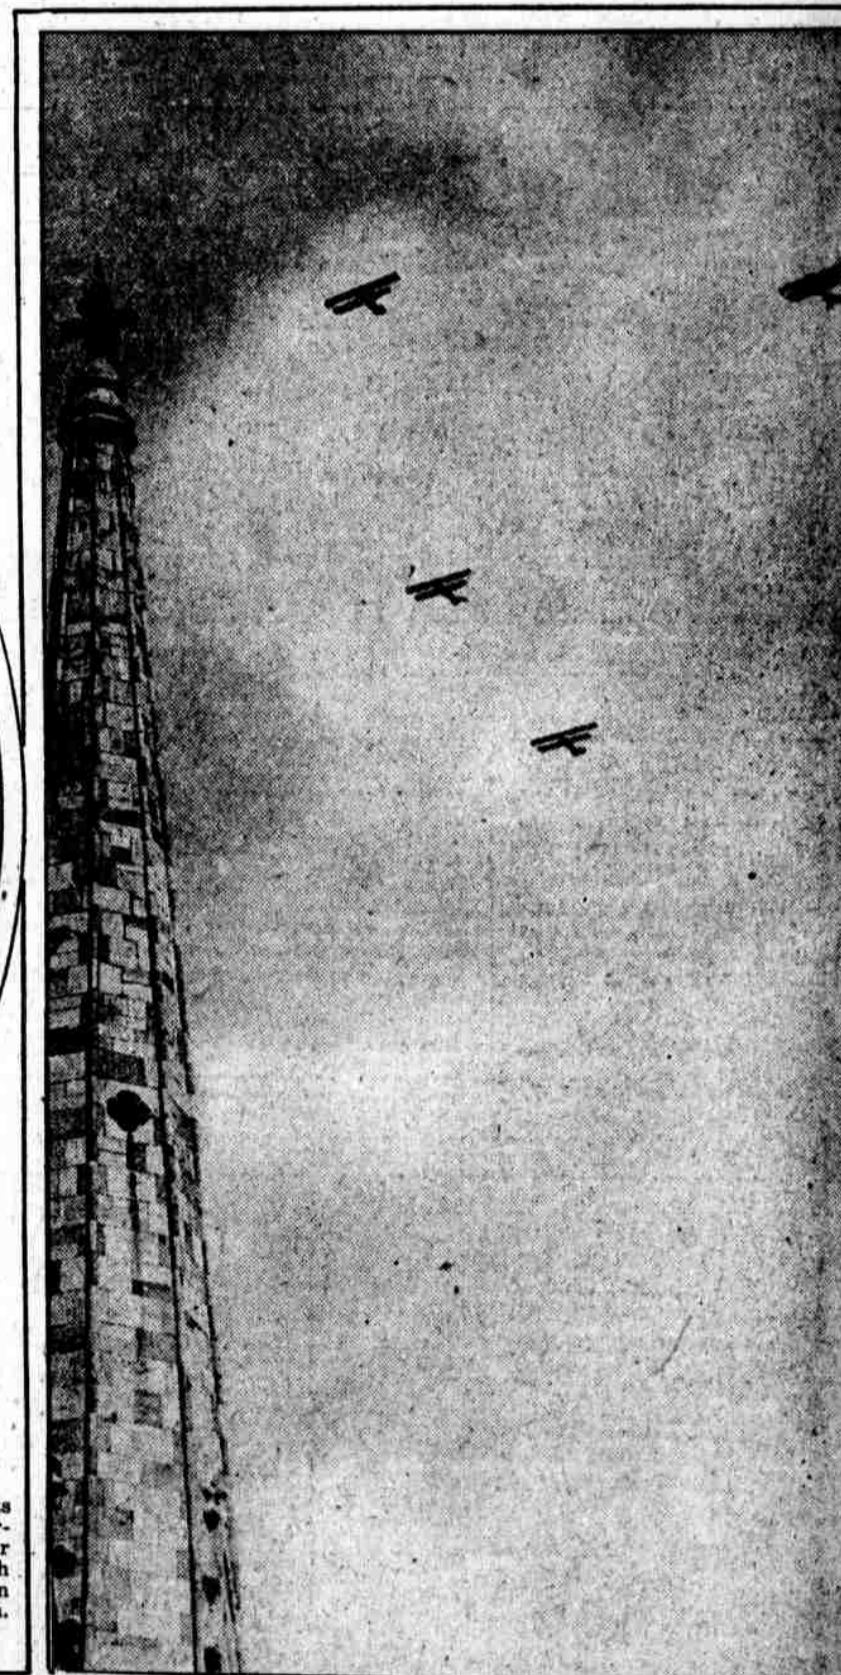

CASUALTIES AMONG the birds were high yesterday, if the numbers of the hunters in the marshes and their tales of well-filled bags are any criterion.

THE WAR NOTE pervaded the time-honored Philadelphia County Fair at Byberry on the opening day, so that the sight of girl chauffeurs demonstrating autotrucks caused little stir.

PHILADELPHIA CRANED its neck yesterday at the sight of airplanes gracefully hovering over the city. The spire of the Arch Street Methodist Church shows in the foreground of the photograph.

A NAME JUSTLY DESCRIPTIVE is that applied to "Flash Girl," a stunning exhibit in the cattle exhibit at Byberry.

A COUNTY FAIR without its horse race would be like Labor Day without its customary parade of the sons of toil, and, needless to say, Byberry has not departed from precedent.
