GERMANS HIDING IN QUARRY HOLES SURRENDER TO BRITISH SOLDIERS

By PHILIP GIBBS

the British attack, just below Villers-Bocage in Gauche Wood, there was all that fighting by the Seventeenth Division which I have mentioned in previous messages. These men hold the record, I imagine, for a continuous advance, as far as I can tell, to points above the Ancre, taking Thieuval, the Schwaben Heide, Bapaume, Courcellette and Martinpuich, with the Welsh troops keeping pace with them, and have gone no less than thirty-seven kilometers from their start to their present positions.

An Astounding Exploit

The attack on Le Transloy by the Yorks and Dorsets was an astonishing exploit. Owing to the strength of this place, where the British were held up by machine guns, and all these sub-divisions were coming up, the Seventeenth closed on it from the north and south—by a sugar factory on the north and a windmill on the south—and pinned it down, taking 400 prisoners in the trenches.

They drove the enemy out of Beaumont and crossed the Canal du Nord, which cut across their front. With the enemy in retreat on the slopes behind, the Yorkshires and others seized this bridgehead, head of the canal and established themselves in the German trench lines on this side of Gaucouze Wood, which the Germans had determined to hold.

All that was necessary to this last battle was to get across and led up to the support of South African troops who were still holding extraordinary things happened. Some days before the battle of September 1, the Seventeenth Division had gained only one mile, the Germans were on either side, and made fierce counter-attacks, in the course of which men of both the German and British battalions had been captured and taken and retaken so often that they were utterly puzzled to know whether they were prisoners or captives.

The Manchesters and the Lancashire Fusiliers had hard fighting here and were first to take batches of prisoners, but in that grim hand-to-hand struggle the prisoners turned on their guards and in the end the British came to render unto the Germans what they had taken. The Germans had been through everything, because they were high and rugged wall left here and there, or houses pierced by shell holes, but still standing, or German pill boxes with massive concrete blocks which had not been overthrown, have altered in shape, becoming smaller, or pitted up in a wilder chaos of broken masonry.
