Notwithstanding the annihilating British bombardment there was a firece machine-gun fire from the enemy and the British had hard going at first, but they broke down all resistance and, having passed to the other side of the canal, went ahead with the tanks around Hony and Bellicourt, where they had their worst fighting, and toward the next organized line of German resistance known as the Masineres-Beaurevoir line.

Prisoners taken on this side say up to that time this line had not been manned, but observers report the rapid movement of German trains westwardmovement of German trains westward, showing that the enemy is rushing up re-enforcements to hold this position, where probably a great battle will be fought. Once through that line the Allies are out in the open country and anything may happen then.
