Former Shipworker in Small Craft Thirty-Six Hours

Craft Thirty-Six Hours

Alexander B. Lucas quit the Pusey & Jones shipyard at Gloucester to sail the broad seas in Uncle Sam's merchant marine, and soon learned the real meaning of the German submarines.

The first ship Lucas started on was disemboweled by a torpedo, and the former shipworker spent thirty-six hours in a small boat bobbing up and down over a rough sea.

Since that time he has made three other trips to France, and each vessel on which he was sailing was attacked by a U-boat. But Lucas is back again, hale and hearty, telling many tales to his old "buddies" in the shipyard.

Despite the danger involved during the wartime voyages across the Atlantic Lucas was anxious to go again. Then the war had to stop and spoil the fun.

NATIONAL MUSEUM OFFICE HEADQUARTERS

War Exigencies Has Caused the Government to Requisition Building

in its desperate search for office quarters in Washington, the Government has taken over markets, private homes, stables, even the National Museum, and turned them into conventional business establishments by installing shiny office furniture and a retinue of clerks and messenger boys, writes Niksah. Of all these improvised offices the National Museum is undoubtedly the most interestthese improvised offices the National Mu-seum is undoubtedly the most interest-

Valuable collections of the hundred and one articles that make up a regula-tion nuseum are boarded up or draped artistically in sheets, but traces of the museum's past can still be seen in almost every room of the building. Even the unromantic click of a dozen typewriters cannot dispel the thrill of working in the room with a few of the choicest of prehistoric monsters or of having a miniature airplane suspended just above one's deak to serve as a diversion. For a long time the girls in one room spent their spare time admir-ing the gorgeous brocade reception dresses of Mrs. Buchanan and other drases of Mrs. Buchanan and other ladies of White House history. Now Mrs. Buchanan's best frock is hidden from the admiring gaze beneath an im-penetrable layer of board, to the great row of the young ladies of the vi-

One long hallway, once a sportsman's paradise of trophics of the chase, is now identified with the past only by a scant dozen animal heads which adorn one side of the wall. Fortunately it is for the proud rhinocercs, deer, or an-islope that he is hung well above the reach of a man, for otherwise he would surely be reduced to the status of the domestic hatrack by the irreverent Gov-arment clerk.

For some time after the Government invasion, the museum still opened the exhibits of its upper halls to the public as usual. Now, however, this territory, too, is needed, and the National Museum has lained the list of Whenheston, building joined the list of Washington's buildings "Not Open to the Public."—Savannah Morning News.
