We Are Walking Through the Mill of an Old Friend

It is a long square in shape, clean, light, well ventilated—all Mr. Juilliard's mill's are like that. They have the newest machinery, the buildings are substantial, with fire-escapes, and the latest improved looms are tended by contented people, conscious of safe surroundings, with constant work and fairly and promptly paid.

Under such conditions large buyers like ourselves get advantages of perfect work at least cost, made under healthful, sanitary arrangements; and as we are regular customers for large quantities, for cash, and no expense incurred at the mill or warehouse to sell the goods, naturally the lowest possible price is fixed for us.

The costs of merchandise are cut down in the interests of our customers, and the quantities we can dispose of and terms on which we buy allow us to sell at retail, in some instances (not all), for the price, or near to it, that some stores, who do not enjoy the same advantages, have to pay for the same articles.

Have you ever thought this out and talked it over at home?

[Signed] John Wanamaker

Twenty Years a Youth, Twenty Years a Bread Winner, Twenty Years a Philosopher

So may be fulfilled in American life the ancient Hindoo maxim that a man should be twenty years a youth, twenty years a soldier and twenty years a householder.

Men's ages in these days, when some men still go on into the eighties with the fire of youth undimmed, may somewhat be expressed in their choice of overcoats.

So at the top of this story are three pictures, hasty and a little impudent.

The young man delights to swagger in the conforming overcoat. Look back in the old-time sporting pictures at the coats worn by the Master of Hounds in some Royal English meet. The young man's swagger coat today is cut very much like it.

Next is the American business man, the greatest commercial fighter in all the world, but somewhat sober in demeanor. In his about-town business he wears the sober style, straight line Chesterfield overcoat and gains respect as a gentleman.

(Third Floor, Market)

whose clothes are so well ordered as to attract no attention.

Third, the man to whom the elder joys of life have come. The man who may luxuriate in a great fur collar and the big blanketing skirts of a magnificent ulster.

Properly speaking, these represent three favorite classifications in overcoats, and in these classifications there are many styles.

Most popular, perhaps, at the moment for men of nearly all ages is the new Town Ulster, which holds in a little at the waist, sports a big comfortable collar and in many ways resembles the Army overcoats, except that it is not so long. It is the town coat for all occasions, and young men especially are affecting it in great numbers.

But the main thing about these overcoats at Wanamaker's is that they are 100 per cent wool, and this is most important to be sure of at this particular moment, considering how many different kinds of clothes are to be found in Philadelphia.

Points a Moral in Men's Hats
