NOTED COACHES SEE MANY POSSIBILITIES IN "HEISMAN SHIFT"

Foster Sanford and Speedy Rush Believe It Presents Numerous Chances for Varied Attack—Tech and Pitt Strong on Defense, but Warner Strategy Won

By ROBERT W. MAXWELL Sports Editor Evening Public Ledger

After the Pitt-Georgia Tech football game last Saturday Foster Sanford, the Rutgers coach, and several other gridiron critics met in the officials' room to talk over the happenings of the afternoon. The "Heisman shift" was the sole topic of conversation, and all voted it a big success.

Judging from the reports of the game, one would believe that Tech didn't have a chance in a million to win and was hopelessly outclassed from the start. I want to correct that impression for no matter how the game looked from the grandstand, a spectator on the field would have been convinced it was the hardest gridiron battle fought in years.

The score was misleading. I have seen terrible games which resulted in 6-0 and 6-0 scores and wonderful battles where both teams had to extend themselves to the limit and end the contest with a count like 4-0. The score tells the result, but never gives one an idea of the character of play unless one is a spectator.

There has been so much interest in this game and so many have asked for a comparison between Georgia Tech and the other teams up here that some of the real critics have been dragged in to do their bit.

Georgia Tech's playing impresses Foster Sanford. Foster Sanford, who knows more about freak formations and Bolshevik football than any other coach in the game, placed his stamp of approval on the southerners.

High-Class Work Shows Tech Not Overrated. Instead of having him crouch behind the center or take his position a yard or so back, the quarter stood with his back against the center and faced the other backfield men.
