Being Pranks and Passions of the Poet Tricotrin

Anyone who knew Paris when that laughing city was the world's playground will find here a delicately tinted portrait in miniature of the thing he loved—gay, brilliant Paris at play. The book's light inconsequence is extraordinarily skilful, exceedingly amus-ing. The escapades of the elegant, preposterous Tricotrin and this absurd companions are ridiculous in the extreme, but they are the effervescence of an irrepressible lightheartedness that is gift of the gods. There is scarcely one novelist in a generon who can transfer it to print without dulling its sparkle ese days there is only Leonard Merrick.

Ghosts or Criminals?

Carolyn Wells in "The Room With the Tassels" has produced a mystery story with surprises and thrills enough to satisfy the most exacting. It begins with a discussion of ghosts and the perfection of the plan of a company of nine men and women to rent a haunted house in order to discover whether ghosts are real or not. They find a house in New Hampshire with a ghost story attached and on their first night in it strange things happen. An apparition later visits the haunted room when it is occupied by one of the skeptical investigations. Two of the party die suddeniy and the body of one of them disappears mystericusly in the night. A detective arrives on the scene when everybody was suspecting everybody else, and of course he solves the problem.
