There must be a starting point for every "school" of national music and, deprived of the advantage of a folk song, which simply represents the combined emotional characteristics of a nation, filtered through centuries of time until it represents these characteristics in a highly concentrated form, the American school, which has not yet fully found itself, must look elsewhere for its initial impetus.

The Tioga Choral Society gave its eighth annual winter concert last Thursday evening in St. Paul's Reformed Eciscopal Church as Broad and Venango streets. An excellent rendition of Mendelscohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given by the members of the society, under the direction of James Hartrell. The soloists were May Ebrey Hots, soprano, and Henri Merrican, tenor, and two members of the society, Miss Ruth Groeneveld and Mrs. Fanchen Cassavant Diller, sang a duct for two sopranos in excellent style. Mrs. Henristia Groeneveld Morris was the planist. The concert was one of the best that the society has given in its eight years of existence.

Philadelphia is fortunate in its large number of good amateur orchestras and choral bodies, and in no way can the principles of good music be so widely and rapidly spread. These bodies deserve every encouragement possible for Waltzes. Pipi will be the conductor.

Lois Bolton Ascribes Success to Outdoor Life

Outdoor Life

Lois Bolton, who plays the leading feminine role in the Field-Mayo comedy. "Twin Beds." at the Walnut next week is an athletic girl. She was born in San Francisco and spends her summers rollicking in the country in California. To this outdoor life she credits her good health and spirits as well as her ability to assume new roles on short notice. She got her first important engagement by playing the ingenue role with the Belasco Stock Company in Los Angeles on short notice, when the original player met with an accident. During this engagement Margaret Mayo was trying out her new farce with the stock company and was so impressed with Miss Bolton's work that she was signed for a long time contract. As the young wife, Miss Bolton has played the role over two thousand times without missing a performance.
