"That is not a decoration. There is the spirit of rebellion behind it-it stirs men to foolish rage against a good government under which they live. No good comes out of rage, No good comes out of fighting. Take down that flag. I command you."

"There is a time to fight. It is when men cannot get their rights in any other way. Our fathers fought." "You shall not provoke these few poor people to ruin all-to spoil all their cause by senseless rlot against authority-if that is what you propose. Take down that flag!

"No." The priest was little, was old. But the holy zeal which animated him was more potent than mere muscle. He brushed past Blais, broke the staff, and flung the flag down into the road. "Not one word to row, sir," he cried. He faced the young man, his hand upraised. "I know you. I know your designs. You are not the true friend of these people. You are thinking only of yourself. It matters not what they suffer from fury and folly so long as you win for yourself."

He leaned out of the window.

"Go to your homes, my people. I tell you as your priest that I will put my hands to your affairs. I have prayed. Now I will work. There is way. I will find it."

"Ask the good father if he will ake the rich Yankees give back ose homes to the people who have turned out-of-doors." suggested Biais, calling to the men below. Their eyes, upturned to his, asked

I must not counsel my people regarding their votes, the letter directs. I must advise fathers and mothers to take their boys and girls out of the big new school. I am warned that further association with Representative Clifford, who has shown enmity to our religion and has discriminated father," said the old man, his melancholy deepening. "Sples are busy about us. What we are trying to do has been misconstrued. The bishop does not understand. He is broadminded. He has developed schools wonderfully. He must have been influenced by lies. I suppose Blais has stirred this latest trouble." "I chided him before the people-I tore down his rebellious flag. He was leading our good men to the ways of violence. It was right for me to do so." "But it sounds different when it is reported by an enemy. I have been ground, afraid my association with you would hurt. I am sorry it has brought you this rebuke. I'll keep away, Father Leclair. You are too good a man to be harmed in this way." He rose and put out his hand.

"No, sit down, Monsiuer." The priest pressed him gently back into his chair. "I am a poor parish priest. I recognize the authority of those in the high places. I want to obey the men whom God has placed over me." He walked a few steps away from the sheltering tree and pointed at the great building on the hill.

"But how can I tell fathers and nothers to take their children away from that school, until our own great men understand our people up here and give our boys and girls what they need?"

Honest tears struggled in the wrinkles of his cheeks. The dusk was down, and the purple shadows had swept out from the river valleys across the fields; but the old man who gazed on the priest from his chair could see the tears.

"The soil has been good to our peo ple all through the years," said Father Leclair. "It fed them in old Nor mandy; it has fed them on this side of the great water. But sad troubles brood over us now, and the soil is no for all the people as it was in the old days. The great school on the hill has brought new hopes and new op portunities, my good friend. There are tools of honest trades there. Wise me teach our boys, and good women in struct our girls.
