A Pair of Parades

Here they moing in full array along the Avenue: All equipment spick and span and ready for review; Marching through the crowded ways along the streets of home. Just as ancient legions brought their standards back to Rome.

Lett-right-left-right-Pretty soft for you tonight— Nothing but some food to fight, When the march is done.

Then I see them in a dream from Flanders to Champagne: Weary, muddy, wet and worn—slogging through the rain; Slogging to another dawn, through the muck of France. Headed for another drive to lead the new advance.

Route march—douse the light— Head the column for the height— Who will see another night When the line is scon?

Here's the jumping-off place now, ready for the charge: Ready when the signal comes with the next barrage; Now the mighty thunder rolls, where the flashes wait As they swing to meet again the final gift of fate.

There's a rollcall on the height, Crosses to the left and right. They'll not be with you tonight When the march is done.

Considerable Institution

NO ONE ever called Pat Moran the "Miracle Man," "The Ancient Master" "The Modern Foch." Pat always has been permitted to get by under cover, minus the hourse huzza and the accompanying hip-hip.

But when it comes to lifting salvage out of the mire, who is his equal? When Pat drew the Phillies some years ago his club had just lost Tom Seaton, Hans Lobert, Doolan, Dooin and apparently the bulk of its talent.

Pat was awarded the remnant-with Alexander still around. Taking over this supposedly wrecked machine, he never finished below second place.

Then he drifts along to Cincinnati, the Red citadel that brought the downfall of them all, from Ned Hanlon to Christy Mathewson.

Not that Pat has bagged any pennant with the Reds up to date. But taking over a club that no one figured among the first five, he makes the most sensational start of the season.

PAT proces again that he knows how to make his club play all the baseball in its system. Which is all the best manager that ever
