

And So They Were Married

By HAZEL DEVO BATCHELOR

START THIS STORY TODAY AN UNEXPECTED raising of the rent in the apartment in which the Raymonds lived precipitated the unexpected possibility of moving. Jack Bond running in early on Sunday afternoon found himself in the midst of a spirited argument.

"It's not a bit keen about moving," Ruth announced heatedly, "but think of paying more than we are for this place." She looked scornfully about the small living room.

"It'll cost a lot to move," put in Scott.

"I know it," sighed Ruth.

"And think of getting something better. Who's going to do the hunting?"

"I will," Ruth answered eagerly.

"And you'll get all tired out running about. It's no fun hunting apartments. You know the trouble we had before we got settled here."

Ruth looked around the small room again. To be sure their things made it look fairly well but the room was woefully cheap.

"You go ahead. I want to read the papers, anyway," Scott said quickly.

"Please, Scott," Ruth pleaded, "a spin would be so lovely, and I won't go without you."

"You get as though you and Jack weren't friendly enough to go with-out me. You don't need a chaperone, do you?"

There might have been nothing at all in Scott's remark, but coming as it did after Scott's persistently cool manner toward Jack it embarrassed Ruth. However, there was nothing to do now but to get dressed and go. Somehow, though, the ride which had promised so well did not invite her as it had.

Just as she was leaving the room she heard Scott say to Jack:

"I thought you were to be in Atlantic City today."

"I couldn't get away till late last night," Jack returned shortly.

"Why didn't you run down this morning? Didn't Natalie expect you?"

"Her mother went down yesterday, she isn't alone," Jack returned.

"You and I going out together, that's the way it should be," he muttered savagely.

"Nonsense Jack, you don't know me. You should ask Scott how impossible I am to get along with. Anyway I'm married to him."

"Have you ever wished things the other way round, Ruth? Tell me, I'd feel better if I knew, and I won't mention it again."

Ruth could have settled things then and there by saying frankly that she had never regretted anything, that Scott would always be first. But that would mean the flirtation with Jack! It was such fun to play with him, so she put him off with an evasive answer which might have meant anything at all.

In the next installment Jack makes trip to Atlantic City and finds the ground strange.

Please Tell Me What to Do

By CYNTHIA

The Spectator's Ideal Girl

Dear Cynthia—For the past three weeks I have been reading your column night and day and have derived a great deal of amusement from some of the letters which I considered very good and was really interested in reading them. I have never had any idea of writing to you, but when I read the letter of that disgusting old who signs himself "Out for a Vamp" my indignation was such that I felt I must write you.

Be Sensible, Jane

Jane, why are you so tangled up, my dear? It's all very simple. Be friends with all the boys and girls and be willing to have the boys you like romp with other girls. The kind of friendship and love that would hold to one boy or one girl alone, when there is no intention to marry, makes for jealousy and backbiting, neither of which could tend to make you happy.
