By HAZEL DEVO BATCHELOR Copyright, 1919, by Public Ledger Co.

START THIS STORY TODAY F PEOPLE cannot have a thing, it is rather foolish to contemplate it too often, not only foolish but daugerous. For instance, it is dangerous for a fif teen-dollar-n-week stenographer to stand before a shop window filled with brocade dresses and furs. Unless she marries and marries out of her class she will never possess them anyway. King Cophetua and the beggar maid are rarely re-enacted in these modern times, and for her to even dream of possessing lovely, expensive, fragile garments through any other means would result in one of two things, discontent or down right wrong doing. And where is the stenographer who has taken the wrong road for the possession of luxurious clothes and a handsomely furnished apartment who has not regretted it ter ribly after it is too late to do anything about it?

And so it is with married life. A man has a fighting chance in the world, and f he chooses wisely, may find happiness. Men do not always marry the women they should, but if they play fair and think before they do anything foolish they can certainly avoid downright un-Jack Bond had lost Ruth happiness. Rowland to another man, but instead of waiting for the wound to heal, hav ing made up his mind to marry, and in order not to show to the world at large that he cared one way or another, he married Natalie Jergens. The thing to do was, of course, to try and make the best of it after he had discovered that he did not care, and he might have done that thing if Ruth had not shown herself ready for a mild flirtation. What Ruth was doing for a pastime, however, was grim carnest to Jack. He had even arrived at the conclusion that Ruth might, after all, care for him.

The following week he was forced to go down to Atlantic City for Natalic. There wasn't a single excuse he could manufacture if he intended to go on living with Natalie at all, so he went.

He found Natalie not so pale and not He found Natalie not so pare and not so listless, the sea air had done worlds for her. He found her quieter and not so exacting in her demands. It puz-zled him. Jack was studying Natalie in the glass. She was very slim, but her slimness was very alluring. She was like a flower on a stem with all that yellow tulle and the blue comb and the very white, young shoulders. Once during their honeymoon, seized with a sudden mood, Jack had stooped and kissed her shoulder as she sat at the dressing table like this.
