And So They Were Married

By HAZEL DEVO BATCHELOR Copyright, 1919, by Public Ledger Co.

START THIS STORY TODAY NATALIE was tired, very tired, when she and Jack finally left the dance. She felt so physically tired that she was mentally depressed ; all of the light sparkle that she had forced her self to show all during the evening had left her. Her feet hurt, and she was conscious of a cold doubt around her Weart. Jack was unusually silent. He summoned a taxi which drove up to the curb with a raucous blow of the korn. He ushered Natalie in in silence and she sank into the corner of the dark little square, feeling as if she could cry at the slightest thing. How the wished that Jack would turn and take her into his arms; that he would show the slightest tenderness, but he had not done any of these things since the had taken her stand at Atlantic City. This more than anything else convinced her that he did not care and never would. Suddenly he turned to her and remarked sarcastically.

'I see your very special friend was It the affair tonight." Natalie started, uncertain as to what to reply.

"He seemed to be showing you a great Ceal of attention," Jack went on. Natalle remembered with a certain pang Jack's persistent attention toward Ruth and the times that she had watched them circle the room together, the unfairness of Jack's attack, together with her tired physical weariness, pre cipitated an attack of nerves that she would have given anything to have Before she knew what she avoided. was doing she burst out: "I suppose you think he showed me broken that calm assurance in which she had encased herself ever since that Atlantic City episode. This was the childish Natalie he understood, not the calm repressed woman who somewhat disturbed and worried him. At last he could understand her again. "Oh, so that's it," he said cruelly "You're jealous. I suppose you're one of the women who think that after marriage a man can't look at any one but his own wife.

'I should think you might have spared me all the lies about business, anyway." Natalie shrilled out, "when you took Ruth out driving the day you had promised to stay with me."

Instead of appealing to his reason, this unwarranted intrusion infuriated Jack still more. "Listening to gossip, eh; well no woman ever did anything with a man by showing him her hand, I'll tell you that much." street. Natalie cowered into her corner and burst into tears. She knew now what had done. UST mention coffee to the men in the service and watch J them smile. These brave fellows have endured long hours of hard labor with little rest. They have forced nature to the breaking point.

Coffee helped them. It cheered them and comforted them. Very often it actually sustained them. Its warmth rested and steadied them, and so gave them new courage for the great tasks ahead.

You men and women in every day life, waging the battle of business, striving to maintain place and power and health -you have great tasks, too. And you find coffee a real help in the day's work.

And the joy of it—the charm of it—the delight of it. It greets you at breakfast-it cheers you at luncheon-it revives you at dinner. And very often regales you at the late supper. Truly-what would your life be without coffee?
