RUTH had come to the point where she had to do the hardest thing in the world. She had to discourage the attentions of a man who flattered her vanity in one fell swoop.

As for Jack, after Mrs. Jergens left his office, he felt strangely uncomfortable. Little things about Natalie kept occurring to him.

WHEN the afternoon train for Alpine whizzed past the train from Alpine to Woodville, Lottie Hayes was in the latter, while her mother was in the former.

"I'll get to Alpine about half-past five," Mrs. Hayes soliloquized, "and I can get to Lottie's boarding house in time for supper.

"I'm going home to her now," said Lottie. After purchasing a dozen newspapers she took the first train for Woodville.

At six o'clock Mrs. Hayes, trimly clad in a new black suit and her last summer's hat, rang the bell at Lottie's boarding house.

"That was his manner changed toward Natalie. It was gentler and more considerate. He was gentler and more considerate.

Now psychology is a queer thing, Natalie, in her childish, undeveloped state before marriage, caring only for frilleries and fashion.

Life grew to be an exciting game. Over the candle-lighted table Natalie in some simple little gown artfully made would bat her husband with personal remarks.

Natalie was playing a game; her heart was set on just one thing and yet try as she would she could not wake Jack to any demonstration of affection for her.

In the next installment, how the triangle became a perfectly amiable rectangle.

The method of production will be a radical departure from all previous methods. The adaptation and direction of each narrative for the motion picture will be under the personal supervision of the author.

It is assumed that an eastern atmosphere will be essential to some of the new productions. Plans are now in preparation for the construction of a large studio establishment near New York.

BRUNO DUKE

Solver of Business Problems By HAROLD WHITEHEAD Copyright.

THE PROBLEM OF THE FIRE INSURANCE AGENTS

Getting the Boys Organized WHEN we had the cards all ready for the boys to use we divided them into four groups each of equal number and equal distance from the office.

Each group of cards contained some nearby streets and some distant streets, suburbs and nearby towns. This insured equal ease or difficulty in covering the territory.

Bruno Duke was most insistent that each boy should have equal work. Here must be no question of difference in work with boys—if there is not absolute equality discontent is quickly bred.

Having got the cards equitably divided, we next got the boys together for their first meeting.

Marlow took charge of it—he's a jim dandy. Hearing him talk gave Bruno Duke an idea which I'll tell about later.

The boys were all seated and ice cream and cake was served before Marlow spoke. What he said was something like this:

"Now you fellows are helping a business in every one of the several ways you are doing. You all know exactly what you are to do and tomorrow you will begin your career as business men.

"We want to do everything we can to help you. We have prepared complete lists of twelve other boys to sell you will not, however, have to work 'on your lonesome,' for we are going to divide you into four companies; each company will have a captain and four privates.

The privates will work under the captain in each company which means the most points in a day will have an extra thirty cents, ten cents for the captain and five cents for each private.

"Now, the captain for one day will always be the private who gets the most points during the day. A point, I should like to have the boys understand, is a short time—go by them, that is, to some slips of paper and placed them in this hat. Each captain will pick out four slips and then call out the names on them.

The boys whose names are called will belong to that captain's company. Now let's have the drawings.

There was much excitement in the drawing. The four captains felt their importance and were very dignified in calling out the names of their 'privates.'

Each captain and his four privates sat together, and already the spirit of rivalry and competition was developing.

"Now, do you all understand it?" Marlow asked, smiling.

A chorus of "yeps, sures and you betchus" greeted his query.

"I'm glad to hear it. Suppose, Jim," turning to one of the captains, "you tell how the contest goes."

"Dead easy," Jim confidently piped. "When my team comes in tomorrow night if we get more of them cards signed up by the guys we call on, I get a dime and then nuts," jerking his chubby thumb in the direction of his team, "all get a nickel." "Yes," a husky-voiced member of the team said, "and if I get more of them cards fixed up than him," pointing to Jim, and then indicating his three fellow-privates, "I'd be the cap next day. That's so, ain't it?" "Good boy, that's right," Marlow clapped his hands in approval. "Now remember to get exact information, for the day after we get your cards, those people will have a letter from us, and if there was a mistake it would hurt us and we should know of it ever so quick."

The knowledge that the work was checked up kept the boys from "guessing" on the cards. One had turned in a number of fake reports but was promptly dismissed and another boy put on. That team felt the disgrace very keenly and did not recover their lost pride until they had pummeled the cause of their hurt till he hollered for mercy. That episode proved an excellent preventive of more trouble in that direction. Each private reported the result of his work to his captain and the four captains announced each evening the total ends filled in by their team during the day. Every boy worked from nine to twelve in the morning and from two to five in the afternoon—that was as long as one could expect them to work intelligently and courteously.
