Nancy Wynne Saw Two Smart Costumes Yesterday. She Talks of Miss Deborah Logan's Debut in the Winter—Other Happenings

IN THESE days when most every one is out of town, do you sometimes walk along the street seeking familiar faces and feel like shrieking loud and clear if you don't see one? I did yesterday, and then, lo and behold you, I met Mrs. Thomas Jeffries and her daughter, Mrs. Pearson Pearce, looking smart and well that I did not expect. I simply smiled and felt better all day.

THE Jeffries will go in a few days to New England. They usually stay in Jamestown, R. I., but a little bird told me lately they were going to Narragansett this year.

Mrs. Jeffries's two sisters, Mrs. John Norris and Mrs. Dick Norris, go to Narragansett every year and are already in their cottages there. The Dick Norrises have a debutante daughter for next season, Mary D. Norris. She is very good looking, fair hair and blue eyes and a very good figure.

Good figure goes without saying, when describing any one with Dobson blood though, and both Mrs. Norrises were Dobsons, you know. Mrs. Dick was Sarah Dobson and Mrs. John, Maria Dobson. Mrs. Jeffries was Miss Mary Dobson and the other two sisters are Mrs. Dobson Altemus and Mrs. Arthur Sparger.

Ellen Glendenning is up in Narragansett now staying with Mary Norris. She's a debutante of next year, too. I saw her grandfather, Mr. George W. Carpenter, on the street the other day and found him looking wonderfully well. Mrs. Glendenning was Miss Bessie Carpenter.

SARAH LOGAN is to have a pretty good time next year, don't you think? She's the first granddaughter in the Samuel Price Wetherill family to make her debut. The Shillard Smiths have no children, neither have the Yorkes Stevensons, and Isabelle Henderson's children are younger again. Deborah Logan's mother was Sarah Wetherill, sister of Mrs. Shillard Smith, Mrs. Yorkes Stevenson and Mrs. Sam Henderson. Samuel Price Wetherill, Jr., is a brother also.

Sarah's grandfather and grandmother, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Price Wetherill, will give the formal reception to introduce Deborah at their beautiful home on Eighteenth street, adjoining Rittenhouse square, on the third and tenth of December. The Stevensons are going to give her a fancy dress party in January, and her father and mother will give a dance in December. The hosts of Wetherill relatives will doubtless entertain for her.

Indeed, don't you wonder how the debs will live through next winter. Why it's utterly impossible to figure on going to all the things they will be asked to. You poor "older bunch," who will be asked to their teas, will about pass out just thinking of it. And after two full years of nothing of the kind, we will scarcely know how to behave, going to real honest-to-goodness parties.

Deborah Logan is very much like her mother. She has light brown curling hair and very bright eyes and is most attractive manner. She will be one of the season's belles without doubt. But goodness, when I think of the season and all those teas! I'm speechless.

WHAT a difference a few years make. Not only in people, but in clothes; and again, not only in clothes, but in the materials; and again, not only in materials, but in the quantity of material used. Fifteen years ago Marian gave Polly, her sister-in-law, a very pretty piece of organdie to make a frock. It was in the days of ruffles and full skirts and the pattern was very pretty, but as it was toward the end of the season, Molly put it away 'til next year. Well, next year she forgot she had it and so it went on 'til about three weeks ago. Polly began going over the small trunk in which she had put "things that could be used some day," and she came across the pretty organdie, and organdie's all the rage now.

Suddenly she called her sister, "Molly, come here and measure this organdie; you know it feels just thick. If there were ten yards, it would make two dresses." Molly came armed with a yard-stick and there were ten yards and Molly and Polly each took five yards and made the organdie into two smart frocks for this summer.
