THE WORLD FOR SALE By SIR GILBERT PARKER Author of "The Seats of the Mighty."

THIS STARTS THE STORY Fleda Druse, daughter of Gabriel Druse, of gypsy blood, shoots in a canoe the Carillon rapids on the Sagblac river where it flows between the towns of Manitou and Lebanon in the Canadian Northwest. She is rescued from the whirlpools below by Max Ingolby, a manager of great interests, who has come to Lebanon to unite the two towns and make them the center of commerce in the western north. On the shore she is insulted by Felix Marchand, a power-ful but disreputable character of Maniton, Ingolby attacks Marchand, who yows revenge. Fleda is claimed by one Jethro Fawe as his wife. under a gypsy custom which united them in marriage when they were children. Floda rejects him and a jenious quarrel ensues between Fawe and Ingolby. Marchand stirs up a foud between the two towns in order o foil Ingello's ambitious. His himself, thrown into the river. Ingolby, in disguise, mingles one night with his enemies in Maniton Fauce reveals his deception and Ingolby is rendered blind by a blow on the head. Fieda comes to him.

In the Greek houses of the better class

a porter was in constant attendance at the door to admit visitors. Slaves wer usually employed in this capacity, and were chained to the door-posts to prevent their wandering and shirking the monotony of the task. They often went to sleep while on duty, and in order to awaken them a short bar of iron was fastened to the door by a chair to be used as a rapper by those desiring entrance to the house

It is saidsthat this strictly utilitarian rapper, as it was first called, was often wrenched from the door to be used as a weapon of offense by visitors who were not friendly disposed toward the householder. A later development was a direct consequence of this misuse, the next type being in the form of a heavy ring fastened by a strong clamp or plate to the door, thus serving the double purpose of knocker and handle.
From Greece the custom was transferred to the Romans, and with the western trend of civilization to nearly every country of Europe. The introduction of knockers to England, where together with Italy and Germany they have attained the greatest artistic development, was no doubt due to the Roman conquest of western Europe and
