think of nothing that could properly squelch Pansy, for the very reason that they all immediately wanted, above everything else in the world, to own an Angora kitten or cat.

Time sped on, and finally Pansy's mother arrived home, and the neighboring children naunted the premises wait ing to be asked in to see the cat. Suddenly there appeared at the window a good-sized yellow and white cat. It was a pretty cat, all right, but it was in no way extraordinary, and it certainly had no sign of an Augora face; neither had it an Angora tail. The friends in chorus called to Pansy, who appeared before them crestfallen. "Huh," said they, "you said your mother was going to bring you an Angora cat. That min't no Angora ent; that's just an old yellow cat!" Pansy hung her head, and then, by way of explanation, she remarked, deprecutingly: "Well, it has Angora ways."
