GLORIANNA CAPTURED ALIVE! SHE'S A LITTLE BOOKWORM

Age 300, Perhaps—Caught Chewing Hole in Ancient Copy of Museum Cortone by George H. Rigby

A real live bookworm—about a quarter of an inch long—is now a captive in Philadelphia.

Gloriana is her name, and she was caught chewing a hole in an ancient, dusty, worn, leather-bound copy of the Museum Cortone, a venerable tome in Latin on the subject of monuments. Her captor is George H. Rigby, a bibliophile, of Locust street near Thirteenth.

The volume was printed in 1750, but Gloriana refused to divulge her age, though it was estimated she must be at least 300 years old, perhaps.

Mr. Rigby happened to pick up the volume yesterday. He was fingering over the page, when there on page 152 he spied Gloriana! She was just bursting into page 153 and had left a perforated path of destruction through 151 pages behind her.

Gloriana is a golden brown grub, not longer than three eighths of an inch, if she's that. Her body is covered with scales, which fold around her like a series of belts. And she's got to shimmy to walk. She's myopic, but nicely discriminating when it comes to judging literature.

Appears to Be Happy

Mr. Rigby enticed her out of the tome by showing her some scraps from the pages of a seventeenth century Boethius, printed by Caxton, and clasped her into a cigarette box. She is still there. And as long as she has a bit of Caxton to munch she's perfectly happy.

There is much speculation about bookworms. Entomologists have given this enemy of bibliophiles a variety of Latin names. The bookworms themselves date back to when the world was young. They plagued the sacred priests as far back as the time of Joseph's pharaoh. It is said, by destroying their title deeds and scrolls of science. And the story is told how, in the days of their power, one of them bored a single hole straight through twenty-seven thick volumes.
