And So They Were Married

By HAZEL DEVO BATCHELOR oht, 1919, by Public Ledger Co.

A LITHOUGH Ruth talked with Elsie, a heap of confidence and assurance with one of the better shops, and comes very well recommended. The price is twenty-five cents. could not get her to promise anything. She admitted the truth of everything smooth away tired lines and wrinkles Ruth had to say, but she said she could and make the skin soft. But the addition of peroxide means the additional not promise not to see Gene again.

"I don't know how it will all end," were her last words. "I probably will never have any happiness again in this world, but I've got to go on." And although Ruth argued that there would be more scandal if this thing went on than there would be if she came out into the open and had a divorce. Elsie simply would not see it that way.

After she had gone the brightness of the apartment seemed dimmed. Ruth did not feel happy. It was at these times that she almost lost her own grip of life. Marriage was such a lottery men and women were such unstable things and so little seemed to bring happiness. She was generally considared happy, but was she? Wasn't there something lacking in her life although she would never have dreamed of admitting it to others and seldom, if ever,

The afternoon mail brought a letter from Jane and Ruth sat down in a chair near the window to devour it. Almost the first paragraph struck a discordant note, if one were clever enough to read between the lines.

"Bob and I are too happy, and things would be utterly perfect if it weren't for his people. Relatives are never pleasant at close range, you know.'

Ruth raised her eyebrows at this. Something must have happened, for Jane did not ordinarily speak this way, and a few lines down Jane described in detail what had annoyed her.

Joy had been ill and she, Jane, had en up almost all night with her. Naturally she had been dead the next morning and things hadn't been ship-shape when Bob's mother had run in on her. In the characteristic way she had, writing coming as natural to her as breathing, she described the conversation which conjured up the whole scene to Ruth's mind. From what Jane had written she and Bob had taken a small apartment. Ruth could see the disordered little rooms, the sick child, the hot, soiled bed linen, and Jane her-self, far from tidy as Bob's mother, spick and span, soft-voiced and hyper-critical entered the place. Ruth could hear her "My dear, what has happened as plainly as if Mrs. West had spoken the words to her, her remon-strances as to the condition of the place and her suggestions that might help it.

"when Bob came home at night I wasn't in a very good humor, and of course the first thing I did was to tell him about his mother's visit. Of course, I exag-gerated some, but not so very much at that, and the more I told him the more silent he grew and the angrier I was be-cause he couldn't see things in my light, and the first thing I knew we were actually quarreling. Of course, it wasn't much of a quarrel and we made up soon afterward, but it's made a difference because things were said that hurt.

"Bob said his mother was older than I was and probably knew more than I did about housekeeping, and he said he thought it wouldn't do me any harm to learn to do things her way. Of course I was furious at that, and I said I would do them in my own way or not at all. And then he just looked around the place, and it was a sight, and he said he did think I might take time to dress in the morning before breakfast, perhaps that was why his mother had spoken as she had. You see, Ruth, I have been wearing that lovely Chinese ccat that you and Helen gave me to breakfast, and, of course, I know it isn't practical when I'm working around the stove, but I hate house dresses, and so I've just let things go around the house sause I didn't want to dirty the coat and I didn't want to take it off."

Ruth let the letter fall into her lap and sighed. Poor Jane! Of course she wouldn't like house dresses, and of course she wanted Bob to love her in the Chinese cont. It wasn't exactly her fault, and yet it wasn't Bob's fault either that he had been brought up by different standards and wanted to see his wife trim and efficient as his mother had been. A man forgets so quickly the tolerance he displays when he is courting. Everything seems different when he is facing his wife across the breakfast table every morning of his life.

As Ruth sat with the letter in her As Ruth sat with the letter in her lap she could not help thinking of the different things she had learned from the marriages of other people. Some of the things she had absorbed, but for the most part she had gone ahead, as most women did, and managed her own affairs. And, of course, that was just what Jane would do-manage her own affairs. No matter how often she was warned, no matter what was given to her in words of advice, she would go warned, no matter what was given to her in words of advice, she would go right on by herself until she had learned from that most drastic teacher experience, and then, perhaps, it would be too late to do anything. After all, Jane lived in an 'atmosphere credled by her own illusions, and from what she had seen of him Bob West was thoroughly practical, accepting realities as a matter of course. Whether he and Jane would weather the difference in their natures remained to be seen. Elsie, too, natures remained to be seen. Elsie, too, was bent on managing things her own way; and what was to come out of it all?

The School Bells

All over the country this week the school bells are ringing, calling hundreds of thousands—millions of children to the class rooms.

Many of these children in the Four States where our stores are located, are the great grandchildren of those who began to trade with us when we opened our first store. We count among many of our most valued customers, four generations.

The opening of the schools always brings a rush every afternoon of our little friends shopping for mother and incidentally, learning useful lessons for life's responsibilities later-we are always glad to welcome them.
