Ludendorff.

Greater than even the Kaiser himself in the determination of Germany's fate during the World War was Erich von Ludendorff, Quartermaster General of the German Army.

In his book Ludendorff takes credit to himself for the planning of the Russian and other campaigns with which Von Hindenburg has been credited.

Propaganda made Von Hindenburg Germany's popular hero. Ludendorff's book makes the commander-in-chief a mere figurehead, approving every strategic plan of the Quartermaster General. And Ludendorff accepts the responsibility.

"He personified the good principle, I the evil one," writes Ludendorff. Note the faces of the two men. The portraits appear to verify Ludendorff's assertions.

The Chapter That Completes the History of the World War

WHEN America entered the war the sources of German war news were closed. What actually went on is now exposed by the man who directed operations behind the screen of strictest military censorship.

He confesses the ghastly failure of Verdun.

He acknowledges the effectiveness of Haig's campaign on the Somme.

He exposes the secret that the Rumanian "victory" was really a German disaster.

He confesses Germany's failure to recognize America's strength.

He enlightens the reader on the inner workings of German diplomacy and the wickedest system of espionage the world has known.
