Julia Grant, a quiet sort of girl. an unusual type of beauty, has been engaged to Dan Carson nearly a year, when she begins to worry about steadily growing indifference on his The wedding date has been set, but three weeks before she can stand the agony no longer and decides to ask him what is wrong. Finally, Julia wrings from Dan the admission that e no longer loves her-that there is be one else. Although completely crushed, she bravely renounces her claim and returns the engagement ring. At the breakfast table the next morning with a simple statement of the truth Julia breaks the news to

She never came to the table to eat a special but she left their pitying ment but she left their pitying eyes upon her. She never entered a croom where her mother and father and perhaps Lucy had been talking without instantly encountering silence superofound that she could not heir knowing that the conversation had been about that the conversation had been about the conversation had been about the first the conversation had been about the conversation had been about hadn't planned a large wedding, for virtuous, but i which Julia was grateful, but, as it was, awfully good." the news had to be told to plenty of friends, who, in turn, gossiped and conectured as to the cause. It was a time of undeserved suffering for Julia, and the inaction of her life made it worse than it would have been if she had been forced to give her thoughts to some hard work.

It was Lucy's private opinion that Julia lacked some of the "pep" that she herself possessed in such great

"Julia is too reserved," she would say to her mother, and Mrs. Grant, laundryman, recently went away, leav-who understood Lucy and stood in awe ing a notice for patrons to drop laundry of Julia, would agree with her. Both through an opening in the door. Most Mrs. Grant and Lucy thought it strange everybody did. that Julia did not confide in either of them. Aside from her confession at the breakfast table that morning, Julia had said nothing at all. The family knew no more about it than Julia had summed in for them in that heist state. med up for them in that brief state-"Dan is in love with another woman."

Lucy thought, "I wonder who it is." Mrs. Grant thought, "She can't be as splendid as our Julia," and Mr. Grant, he thought anything, felt sorry for his tall, silent daughter. But inasmuch as there had been a certain diffidence etween himself and the girls since they had grown to womanhood, he never even told Julia he was sorry, and she was more grateful for that than he Julia's thoughts went over the ground again and again. Deeper than the intense blow to her pride was the thought that in some way she had failed with Dan. She had failed to hold him and any woman who cannot hold her man above all before marriage is not worthy of any great trust. But how had she failed? What was lacking in her that this other woman possessed? That Dan was utterly infatuated with this other woman Julia knew quite well. His attitude in telling her the other night had more than convinced her of that fact, He was possessed by her, willing to go to any lengths to get her. Julia thought these moments of introspection that she knew the other woman she could ot possibly suffer as she was suffering now when she was entirely in the dark.

After a week of this intense brooding ulia had dark circles under her eyes. She was wandering around in a morass of feeling and not seeing her way clear o. anything. She fought shy of all her friends and took solitary walks, alone with her thoughts. She was feverishly eager for the wedding day to come and She felt that after that she could egin to live again.

The day that Julia was to have been sarried dawned gray and with a drizzling rain splashing against the window panes. Wet as it was, after breakfast she buttoned herself into her raincoat and went out. Lucy, lounging in a rocker in her mother's upstairs sitting room, heard the door slam and looked out to see Julia walking down the Lucy's eyes filled with tears in spite of herself. "it's Julia!" she exclaimed.

Mrs. Grant sighed. "It's so bad for her to brood like this."

Fifty Thousand Cows Milked twice a day are required to furnish the butter needs of our stores every day in the year. Every herd is made up of select cattle carefully inspected. We use only the product of the Best Creameries.

Further, by way of information-the average farmer with 100 acres of land will keep ten milch cows. On this basis it would take five thousand farms, one hundred acres each, or five hundred thousand acres of land altogether, to supply the food, care and shelter for the cows necessary to supply the daily butter needs of the great American Stores' chain.

Reader, there is just one answer to this immense output-Quality. Let us prove it to
