Collecting fares in a street car during the dull period around 10 o'clock in the morning may seem a very simple matter, but to a conductor on one of the lines in Philadelphia it is a truly harassing roblem. He begins at one side of the car, switches to the other, then back again, until he has forgotten who has paid his fare and who is attempting to evade the law. All that would be necessary to make everybody comfortable on that car is a little system. It is system that makes the machinery of the business world run smoothly, a secret that the Chestnut Street Shops have long ago discovered.
