THE WINGS OF DESIRE. By Rita Well man. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co

There is more authentic poetry in authentic fiction, whether it has a formal heroine, a hero absolute, a "plot" and a purpose, ethical, spiritual, moral, clinical or what not; whether it edifies or amuses; whether it edifies or amuses; whether it chastens morals with a smile or bludgeous morals with a horrible example. What matters in fiction, after all, is the reflection of life, not necessarily full face in an ensconced mirror, but with the subject and the mirror at the various augles of plausible temperament and believable situation and the candles in the sconces varying the degree and intensity of the lighting.

Miss Wellman in "The Wings of Desire" has surpassed her study of racial of the part the individual. These dramatic persons are, cen-trally, an artist and, broadly speaking, early youth to past the zenith, including his foster mother, whom he believed his real mother; an exotic woman, fond of many men, faithless to all, a painter who was not an artist in pigments, bu a terrifying woman of unusual and al-most inacceptable beauty, who was an artist in sensations and emotions; an artist's model, delicately youthful, de-liciously lovely, yet soulless, ignorant, innocent, a beautiful farce in a man's ife and a tragedy in her own, and the woman who won, the Ann Whittield to his John Tanner, an upstanding, hand-some, athletic, whole-souled American girl of the breay, outdoors, able-to-take-care-of-herself type. These char-acters are accurately and animatedly drawn. Supplementary characters such drawn. Supplementary characters, such as the widow with the Plymouth Rock conscience; the grande dame, tolerant, in the best of taste, of her philandering husband's escapades; the Greenwich village optimist and the painter who practices his art by a time clock are also all highly humanized.

"The Touch of Abner" De lightful in Drollery

In Robins and Things

There is no more persistent and conscientious student of birds in America than Mrs. Gene Stratton-Porter, widely known as an author of popular fiction, and there is no more interesting writer about birds than she.

Three years ago Mrs. Stratton-Porter was telling an acquaintance of some of the interesting incidents connected with her pursuits of bird lore when it was suggested that she write a book about the subject. This she has done in "Homing With the Birds," which might be called an ornithologist's autobiography. The book is filled with most fascinating tales about birds.

As a child the author was fond of birds and learned how to approach them without disturbing them on their nests. She acquainted herself with every species on her father's farm. One day her father delighted her heart by telling her that he gave her for her own all the birds on the farm. The little girl thereupon assumed a proprietorship which consisted mostly of a subject of the old farm, which is discovered and preserved as part of the plot. But and preserved as part of the plot. But for the humor is, after all, the chief charm, inc. It is infectious. And the love story of concerning Abner's girl is also prettily sentimental without being mushy. that flew. Amy Lowell's Virtuosity

If Amy Lowell would use her un doubted gifts in writing poetry after European models instead of fashioning her verse on the models of China and Japan she would be read by men and women who have no use for her verse now. But perhaps Miss Lowell does not care for that kind of popularity. It must be assumed that she does no or she would not persist.

Her latest volume, "Pictures of the Floating World." contains the verse

China the mysterious, the alluring, is the background of this powerful novel. Dramatic scenes follow each other with breathless rapidity. Peter Moore, wireless operator on the S. S. Vandalia, receives a weird message, and assists in a thrilling adventure. Thereafter the pages of Peter's life are filled to overflowing with colorful ro-mances, unusual happenings and narrow escapes; until he pierces the mystery of the City of Stolen Lives, and overthrows the power of a strong and un-scrupulous league of Chinese.
