

JUST GOSSIP ABOUT PEOPLE

Nancy Wynne Goes Late to Town Teas and Stops First at the Century Club—The Meeting Interests Her Strangely

NOT a tea today. Another chance to rest up after going to three yesterday? Wasn't it going some, though? And did you hear about Isabel Page having gone out to California to take up movie acting. Every one is talking about it at the teas. I understand she has had the idea for some time. And certainly Isabel is delicately pretty and sweet enough looking to rival Mary Pickford and any of the other famous movie beauties.

I have often wished when I have seen some of the awful travesties in pictures of people in society at parties and such affairs that they really would show some persons who know how to act in the conventional way.

I'll never forget one picture I saw which depicted a party in some leading society man's home. The guests were all dancing as if their lives depended upon getting to a certain point in the room at a given moment; when suddenly a maid appeared with a tray of cocktails. Instantly the "gay and fast set" broke up and the "ladies" took each other in the dance and the "gentlemen" flying leap to the tray, grabbed their individual cocktails from the maid and cavorted gaily about the room!

Now, you know, that's going some. I spoiled the whole picture for me. When I see something absolutely accurate in a picture or read it in a book I feel as if the rest must be just as far-fetched and exaggerated.

And so if charming girls such as Isabel go into that work they can certainly put a little bit of the real thing into some of the pictures.

Isabel is a daughter of the William Byrd Page. You know, Mr. Page is well known in the city. He has been seen bring ice cream out of a top hat and hand it round an audience in a most marvelous manner.

He is the son of Mr. S. Davis Page and a brother of Mrs. James Large and of Howard Wurts Page. The Howard Page's daughters, Evelyn and Mary, who are very attractive, by the way, are Isabel's cousins. They will be introduced November 20.

AS THERE were no teas till late to go to yesterday afternoon, as they were all given in town, I occupied my little self by stopping in at the Century Club. I had heard there was to be a discussion on the woman's pages of today, and as to whether this body of women would or would not consign the society column to the scrap basket. There were more than two hundred women there I should say, and do you know what struck me more forcibly than anything else? It was this: How little these women, who are the thinking, intelligent women of the city, know of human nature.

It does not seem possible to some that there are in this world of ours nearly nineteen hundred million beings and that it is possible for those millions of beings to have different points of view from ours, to have sorrows in their lives and be unable to solve their difficulties themselves, and to write to some one whose name they trust or whose knowledge they trust.

And yet, it is true. One of the speakers quoted some letters and answers to correspondents of a woman's page, letters which I had happened to see myself and which a kind-hearted, desirous-to-be-helpful woman had thought over, had stayed into at her desk day after day to answer, and in a way really to help, and I am sorry to say, that the letters themselves, and their answers were misquoted. To be sure, it is a travesty, but travesties should not be inaccurate when names and quotations are made, should they?

THESE the discussion passed onto the society page. Should it be abolished? And one dear elderly lady objected to having read on one society page accounts of five weddings in various parts of the city at which the brides wore white satin. She said she did not care what they wore nor that one was married in Germantown, another in Tioga, one in the city, and another in the suburbs, and came home, and so on, and so on. That it took up too much space.

To be sure, we might ask the brides not all to wear white satin on the same day, but then, on their own wedding days, it does seem a little selfish to insist that we choose their gowns for them to break the monopoly of the page. Usually you are married only once, and somehow or other you kind of feel as if it were your own wedding, and your own gown, don't you?

LET us look at the other side a tiny bit. Do you remember seeing the newspaper account of your father's and mother's wedding the first time it was shown to you? Do you remember how delighted you were to read the little details? How would you like it if the Society Editor of those days had run a condensed account of the wedding of that day something like this:

And, too, how few women realize that the newspaper, including the woman's pages and the society pages, give the composite reader what he or she wants. And the composite reader usually appreciates it, too.

And, too, how few women realize that the newspaper, including the woman's pages and the society pages, give the composite reader what he or she wants. And the composite reader usually appreciates it, too.
