Nancy Wynne Attends the Opera and Sees Many New and Gorgeous Gowns—She Talks of Debutantes and the Oriental Bazaar

WELL, it was some opening last night, was it not? Even though the armistice had been declared before the opening opera last night, most of the women appeared in gowns of the winter before, but last night there was not an old gown in that grand tier. And all were so smart!

Such brilliant colors and so extreme in style. My goodness! You know, last spring everything was to be longer and the gowns did actually become longer, but last night the frocks were shorter than ever before.

Very not predominant, there's no question about that. And brilliant shades of velvet—geranium, electric blue, that queer bright green that has a sort of cloud over it, rose pink and deep purple were the favored colors.

Every one was interested to see the Baroness de Marchienne, the wife of the Belgian ambassador.

The baroness is certainly a good-looking woman. She wore a wonderful gown of green and silver brocade, a coronet of diamonds and a necklace of diamonds and carried a huge bright green ostrich feather.

There was one gown which stood out among the rest, though it was of black satin, and I think there are in it, all been as much as two yards in it, all been as much as two yards in it.

"AIDA," BRILLIANTLY SUNG, MARKS OPENING OF OPERA

Metropolitan Company Here Brings Back Many Old Favorites and Some Debutantes—New Contralto Scores

With a star cast, an audience huge in size and brilliant in personnel, and general enthusiasm, the Philadelphia season of the Metropolitan Opera Company was opened last evening. Only the weather refused to enter into the spirit of the occasion. The opera of Mr. Gatti's choice was "Aida," which by reason both of familiarity and of its spectacular possibilities is always a good opening one.

The cast contained old favorites and debutantes in almost equal proportions. Emmy Destinn, whose name appeared in this form on the program in spite of her wish to be known as Destinnova, was Aida and Giovanni Martinelli sang the part of the prince, Ramfis.

The opera as a whole was very successful. The cast contained old favorites and debutantes in almost equal proportions. Emmy Destinn, whose name appeared in this form on the program in spite of her wish to be known as Destinnova, was Aida and Giovanni Martinelli sang the part of the prince, Ramfis.
