PRINCESS DREAMS

By HORTENSE WILSON

IT WAS a wild, bleak, winter night, but the wildness of the night seemed to have little or no effect upon the crowd of merry young fellows gathered around the fireplace in a room of one of the dormitories of Jamieson College. Although there was much laughing and good-natured "hiding" as story after story was told, friendship and good-fellowship prevailed. After all but one had related some story, true or fictitious, deep silence reigned for several moments.

"Little Jack MacKenzie finally piped up: 'Well, Dick Holmes, it's about time we heard your tale.' The fellow thus addressed was sitting apart from the others, gazing dreamily into the fireplace, as if deep in thought. When spoken to, he lazily stretched himself, and settled more comfortably into his roomy Morris chair, as if reluctant to leave his thoughts.

"Then after hesitating a moment he started: 'It was one morning last summer, when I was spending my vacation at a small village in the White Mountains. The hotel was deserted, and all the usual diversions of a summer resort had just interest for me. I turned reading, but I was unable to find anything interesting around the office, so I walked over to the village library for some books to pass away the time between books.

"When I was looking over the shelves devoted to fiction, I noticed a book bound in white leather, the title of which was 'Princess Dreams.' The name seemed promising, so I took it down. Of course you know, fellows, anything pertaining to the opposite sex always interests me.

"Leave that to you, Dick," remarked Tom Alward, his chum. "I took the book to a chair near the window, and as I opened it, a picture fell out. It was a picture of a girl about nineteen.

"Enter the princess. The hero fell in love with her," I read in the caption. Here there was a moment's pause while Dick seized Tom, and calmly deposited him in the waste-paper basket. "And she was a very pretty girl," continued Dick, after Tom had resumed his seat.

"She was seated on a rustic bench holding a parasol in one hand and a letter which she was reading in the other. By her expression it was evidently a very pleasant letter. "There was something very attractive and pleasing about her face, and the more I looked at the picture the more determined I became to find the original, although I was at a loss to know how to begin my quest.

"I thought and thought, and at last I asked the librarian who had borrowed the book last. She told me that the book had been loaned to a guest at a neighboring hotel, but that it had been returned more than a week ago.

"Then another difficulty arose. Was the person who borrowed the book the one who had written the title? I asked the librarian who had borrowed the book last. She told me that the book had been loaned to a guest at a neighboring hotel, but that it had been returned more than a week ago.

YANKETS OUTWIT SWEDS

Defeat Commercial Coup by Quoting Lower Prices to Germans

London, Nov. 28.—(By A. P.)—Swedish and Danish merchants who planned a commercial coup in Germany have suffered as the result of American commercial energy in the past few months. An American salesman just returned to London from the continent said that large quantities of American goods are held in Sweden and Denmark that cannot now be disposed of.

The Swedes and Danes purchased the goods from the United States in hopes of pushing it into Germany immediately. Trade opened. When that time came they found American firms had arranged to supply the demand at prices under what the Scandinavian middlemen could quote. Consequently the Swedes and Danes still have their goods.

Britain Against U. S.

Melbourne, Australia, Nov. 28.—Joseph Hume Cook, minister of the navy, in a speech yesterday in Albany said that although he wholeheartedly supported the league of nations, he believed that Great Britain should keep its powder dry. The empire, he said, could not close its eyes to the preparation Japan and America were making in furtherance of their Pacific policy.
