"-With a Welcome to Everybody and to Strangers Especially"

In a Kindly Letter of Months Ago a Thoughtful Woman wrote that she was riding in a Market street trolley car where two men stood in front of her, talking, one of them, pointing out to the other points of interest along the street, adding, "I am sorry you have stood so long, but we are near to Wanamaker's, and then you will get a seat."

The stranger laughed. "Ever since I moved to Philadelphia," he said, "I have been told that I could get this, that or the other at Wanamaker's. Now it seems that I can even get a seat in the street car.'

There are eight large doors from the four wide streets for the people to find entrance and exit, and four fire and smoke proof towers, each of them within a minute and a quarter, on each floor for the safety of all the people who come.

From the top to the bottom are forty-eight elevators running every minute for the public

All the hospitalities of the great building are free and with a welcome to everybody, and to strangers, especially.
