FOREIGN EXCHANGE VEXING PROBLEM

Depreciation of European Currencies Putting Prohibitive Cost on American Goods

CRISIS BELIEVED PAST

There is no factor in the general situation giving greater concern or is being studied more diligently by close students of economics than the foreign exchange markets. It seems to be the consensus of opinion, however, that the worst has been seen, and with careful nursing a reasonable state of equilibrium will be re-established.

The exchange situation was approaching a point where complete demoralization was inevitable unless natural or artificial influences were brought into play. The depreciated buying power of the currencies of the European countries, which is but another way of stating the fall in exchange, has already raised the cost of American goods to European purchasers to a point which is prohibitive in the case of all but the most necessary commodities.

The Philadelphia Commercial Museum, in discussing this angle of the foreign situation, says:

"The handicap on export business imposed by the present exchange rates is having an indirect effect which cannot be disregarded. The value of the dollar has appreciated to such an extent in every European country that it is driving the European countries to deal more and more among themselves, to the exclusion of this country, and for the reason that with their present depreciated currencies they can buy of each other more cheaply than they can buy of this country.

Another indirect effect of the present condition of the international exchanges which cannot be disregarded is the fact that in other parts of the world—in South America, in Australia and South Africa—the purchaser can buy a given commodity at a smaller cost from a European country than the identical article can be purchased in the United States.

"In an effort to correct the exchange or rather to prevent its getting worse, many exporters have been selling goods on open account, which merely postpones the day of reckoning. Others have been granting long-term credits. But it is open to question if export merchants have not gone as far as they are able to go in this extension of credits.

"The banks have been co-operating with the merchants in the granting of these credits, but they, too, are beginning to curtail their accommodations or to require a different kind of collateral for their loans. There has been some liquidations of American securities held in this country for account of Europe, and Europe has been selling some of the securities, mobilized here during the war as collateral for loans, which have been freed by the maturity of the loans.

"It has been proposed, as a further corrective measure, that the United Kingdom in particular, and other European countries as well, transfer some of their large South American and other investments to this country."

Prices Steady on Paris Bourse

Paris, Dec. 18.—Prices were steady on the Bourse today. Three per cent rentes were quoted at 60f 15c; 5 per cent loan, 88f 15c; exchange on London, 42f 35c. The dollar was quoted at 11f 27½c.
