

"Cinderella's Daughter"

By HAZEL DEYO BATCHELOR

SYNOPSIS
Virginia West meets Kathleen Foster at boarding school and both girls become engaged to college men. Neither boy has any money and Virginia's mother removes her from school in the hope of breaking up the infatuation and finding a wealthy husband for Virginia. In the mountains they meet Sherman Holmes, but when he proposes to Virginia she refuses him. Mrs. West then confesses that she has very little money left in the world.

"MARRY that penniless boy!" Mrs. West's voice rose in shrill reproach. "Ruin all your chances like that!" And she burst into tears. Long after, when Virginia had coaxed her to sleep and lay awake by her mother's side listening to the countless little night noises outside and wondering as no girl of eighteen should about the future, there came at last the conviction that the future was no longer to be accepted passively as she had accepted it all her life. Life was hers now to live for herself, and there was something glorious in the thought, ignorant and frightened as she was. With this realization she dropped asleep.

Mrs. West was still asleep the next morning when Virginia opened her eyes. She slept like a child, and Virginia lay looking at her for a long time. She felt a great enveloping tenderness for her mother. It wasn't her fault, any of it—used to luxury all her life, as she had been, and with no idea of how to use money. Virginia thought of the useless extravagances which she might have helped to avoid if she had known the truth, and wondered what her mother would do without the things about her that meant, not luxury now, but just the necessities of daily living.

She ordered breakfast upstairs and telephoned down to the office that they were giving up their rooms. When the breakfast came she carried it to a little table pulled up close to the side of the bed. The room was already strewn with their belongings and two large trunks were standing open in the next room all ready to be packed.

Mrs. West was listless and depressed. She consented to Virginia's plan to leave immediately simply because there seemed nothing else to do. In one day Virginia had emerged from under her mother's wing and was taking the reins of government into her own hands. Yesterday she had been a spoiled child about whom her mother cared more than she had ever been for anything before in her life.

They left the hotel without seeing Sherman Holmes, and Virginia, who had managed everything, looked sad when they were finally seated in the train, and wept into her handkerchief like a frightened child. The glory that she had felt the night before had departed. She was facing reality now, and it was very different from just speculating about life from a safe vantage point.

Virginia had telegraphed Jimmy that morning, and when she reached home an answer was waiting for her. Jimmy would be in town Saturday. A little ray of comfort stole into her heart with this assurance. She did not feel quite so alone. A thick envelope containing a letter from Kathleen was also waiting for her, and she sat down in the unheated living room with her hat and coat still on to read it. Mrs. West was not depressed to the extent of neglecting her looks in any way. She was already in her room repairing the ravages that the train trip had caused, cold-creaming her face and slipping into a soft negligee. These things were as natural to her as getting up in the morning; she even hummed a little tune while she drew the comb through the waves of her hair.

Kathleen's letter was full of excitement. She had met a wealthy man who had invited her to a party on his yacht; but he was old and she couldn't make up her mind to marry him. She had missed Virginia, but that was over now, as she and her mother were coming to New York next week.

"We'll have some gay times this winter with no rules to worry about and nothing to do but enjoy ourselves," the letter ran. "By the way, I broke my engagement to Bill. I liked him, but what was the use? He is poor and I am awfully extravagant. Have you forgotten your foolishness with Jimmy? I hope so. You ought to marry some one with plenty of money." Virginia let the letter fall into her lap. For a time she had forgotten all about Kathleen.

(Tomorrow—Jimmy decides life for Virginia.)

Adventures With a Purse

ONE shop has mighty nice boxes of candy, specially prepared for little people. It has in it several kinds of pure, hard candy, and—yes—even some taffies on sticks, which have acquired the polly name of lollipops. The box costs eighty cents.

And, speaking of candy, I saw a very unusual candy box—the kind you leave around on the living-room table.

Send a self-addressed, stamped envelope to the Editor of Woman's Page, or call Walnut 3000, for names of shops where articles mentioned in Adventures With a Purse may be purchased.

Young Women Find Coats of Camels' Hair and Polo Cloth Smartest of All

And not only are these coats most becoming and fashionable, but they are also very soft and warm and comfortable to wear in winter weather.

The newest idea is, of course, the short coat, jauntily belted and topped with a smart collar of self material or of nutria, racoon or sealene fur. Many of these fur collars are detachable, so that the coat can be worn well into the Spring.

The longer coats are cut with inverted pleats or wide folds down the backs, have belts and slash pockets. They are in the natural tan color or in a soft wood brown.

Prices range from $25 to $97.50.

Where Sizes Are Incomplete Low Prices Prevail

and this means real economy—in the choosing of the winter coat that you have delayed buying. There are many, many excellent coats of thick, warm materials, with or without fur trimming, and all are marked at much less than their original prices. Prices start at $15.
