SYNOPSIS

From the time they were at boarding school together something drew Kethleen Foster and Virginia West into a friendship. They were entirely different in temperament. Kathleen being all froth and Virginia all seriousness, and when it came time to whole this difference in a tangible manner. Kathleen broke her engagement because the man had no money, and Virginia married Jimmy Anderman in spite of poverty.

Virginia always got up first, put down the window, turned on the heat so that the place would be warm and after "Perfectly Lovely"

London, Jan. 12.—Bessie Ascough, designer of dresses for readers of Lord Northeliffe's newspapers, answers father Bernard Vaughn's censure of prevailing women's fashions as follows:

"The average woman in choosing her dresses never thinks about men at all. The only problem for her is. 'Does it suit me?' Look at the dresses in the mid-Victorian age; look how low they were cut around the neck.

"Nor do I think bare-back frocks should be condemned. I have seen women who have looked perfectly lovely in these gowns. In fact, the whole scheme was so near perfection that the

"Jimmy you're not going to get up today." Virginia said decisively. "And I'm going to have the doctor here." "Nonsense." And Jimmy tried to assert himself in the old way, but it was no use. After he had played with the food Virginia brought to his bed, the hurriedly went after the doctor her-

There was no telephone in the small apartment and Virginia had missed this more than anything else. In the old days her mother had always telephone of the materials from the market, and the tinkling of the telephone bell had always been the signal for long exciting telephone conversations. Now Virginia sent to market every morning. She had bearned to realize values, and she knew sent to market every morning. She had learned to realize values, and she knew just how much had been wasted when she had lived at home, but she missed the convenience of a telephone a hunthe convenience of a telephone a hundred times a day.

Doctor Bradley had known Virginia since she had been a small child, and a promised to drop in at the apartment as soon as his morning office hours were ret. He was very fond of the girl and he did not feel that her present difficulties would hurt her. Her appearance this morning dld not alarm him any. He set that Virginia was needlessiy felt that Virginia was needlessly rightened and that Jimmy had nothing but a bad cold. But when he finally best over the yellow enameled bed and took the dry, hot hand in his, he realized that Jimmy was really sick. It looked the pneumonia and the boy did not seem "You'll have to get some one to help mi here," he said, looking up at Vir-

And so that was how Mrs. Anderson

appened to arrive at the apartment the est afternoon, and even with Jimmy ring weak and ill in the next room she ad to take the time to tell Virginia virginia was slient and apathetic and expended not at all to Mrs. Anderson's brisk attack. She led the way to limmy's room and was forced to stand back while Mrs. Anderson took charge of everything. From the moment she arrived she took matters into her own hads. The sick room was to be her ewn especial charge while Virginia was given the house and kitchen work as her share. It was unbearable. Even if Jimmy had begun to improve, Virginia would have suffered, but the fact that Jimmy did not improve, but grew steadlly worse made things almost impossible
