"Dad, this isn't what I asked you here for, but is there anything new in Harry's case?"

"It still stands just like Uncle George "it still stands just like Uncle George wards that you sent for mg, then what is it?"

"I'm just plain nervous, dad. I—I seem to have gone to pieces. I simply had to talk to some one!" It had always been difficult for these two to be outspoken in their feeling, but the strain of her situation compelled an unhesitating directness.

"From what you've done for me, dad, I know I mean more to you than any one else—and you're the closest person to me in the world. Since I had to talk with you. It's—it's about Kenneth and to talk with you. It's—it's about

"As a cabinetmaker, to fix my desk," Jenuie explained, falling in with her father's ruse, though still in a daze. Her father, passing himself off as a thief to save her in this desperate crisis!

—She could not let him suffer for it. Her love for him rushed to the rescue—

Her love for him rushed to the rescue— as far as it dared. "But that watch is really all he get thus far. I wish you wouldn't send him to jail, Kenneth, if you can feel that you don't have to." "Why not?" asked Kenneth. She had been in tight situations be-fore, but none quite so tight as this. "What have you got to say?" Kenneth asked Black flerry.

"What's the use of my saying anything?" Jerry responded gruffly. "What you say is all that counts."

"I yield to my wife's request," said Kenneth. "I'll let you off."

Jennie's relief was us vast and sudden as had been her suspense. They were safe! They had saved the situation!

And then Kenneth closed the door, and stepped into the room. He faced Black Jerry: Black Jerry:

"Your voice seemed familiar. But I didn't place it at first."

"My voice?" queried Jerry.

"I place it now," said Kenneth. "Remember that night out at Silver Bluffs when you played with my windpipe? You said you were Jennie's cousin."

"Don't remember anything about any such time. But I'm not her cousin." The strange, drawn look Jennie had worried over in Kenneth's face was now no longer there; his face was workng. His next words came out as a harn explosion. "I know you're not! You're her

If that check has my father's signature, I can get the money to straighten out my accounts in the morning over at Shipman's. And then I'll make my clean-up—the market is absolutely sure to jurn right in a few days or a week or two!—and then I'll deposit the $50,000 back into the account of Harrison & Co. before it's missed and everything will be all right! All I ask of you.

Jennie, is just to sign my lather's name. Here's a sample of his signature. It looks hard—I couldn't do it—but for you it will be easy! Jennie, you'll do it for me, won't you?" (CONTINUED TOMORROW)

"Jennie—you're not really serious?"

"I'm serious in the way I feelthough I can't tell what he suspects or knows. But that has always been the danger, that he might some time find out."

"And if he did find out," demanded Jerry, "what would he do?"

"He's very proud, dad, and very ambitious. I'm sure it would be the end of things between us. He'd throw me out. I can't tell you how sick I am thinking of that. And if he does, what am I ever to do?"

"I' he does?"—Jerry's big chest heaved and he ventured to trike her hand—"If he does. I'll still be backing you! But the chances are you're all wrong. You're going to stick right to the job, and keep on playing the game to the finish!"

"Of course I am, dad!"

"That's right. And this nervousness of yours will wear off, you see."

He spoke on reassuringly, his derk, hungry eyes on her face, still holding the hand he had dared take. His gruff, definite words were deeply comforting to her; for a few moments her spirit rested against the rugged strength of his; such support and comfort were whit she had hungered for in the mond which had possessed her these many days. In these moments there was a strong influence of her courses and confidence: once more she began to feel her accustomed strength to me and handle any situation.
